Rural School Studies

A western soil expert contends that the country school ought to be more agricultural-minded than at present, and believes that rural education needs but this one more advance step to make its emancipation complete. It is this gentleman's opinion that the country school should give more attention to common problems in terms of rural life, as city schools are integrated to urban conditions.—Fort

Community Judged by the Individual Home

Just what do you really owe to your community? Is the query made by the Buffalo Courier-Express. Is it enough to pay taxes and be a "good citizen" in a moral sense alone?

Plan Program First

The preparation of a thoroughly considered program, based on exhaustive study of existing conditions and probable future trends, is a prerequisite of a worth-while city plan. That accomplished and the program adopted it is vitally important that exceptions to the rules laid down be granted sparingly, short of a conclusive showing that the original requirement was an error. Otherwise, zoning becomes ineffective in practice. This is a danger that needs to be avoided in localities where city planning has been adopted. Rules, frequently broken, become worthless as a guide.

Chinese Foods In Cans

It used to be that only dwellers in cities with a Chinese population could enjoy Chinese food. But today anyone can explore the strangely delicious food which the Chinese have perfected during their thousands of years of civilization.

Bamboo shoots, water chestnuts, chow mein noodles, bean sprouts can all be bought in cans. And, with a bottle of soy sauce and such other foods as are present in any market, real Chinese foods can be made anywhere.

How to Make Them

Here is the most approved method for making pork chop suey. Cut one-half pound lean pork in narrow strips and add to two tablespoons cooking oil and two tablespoons soy sauce, and sauté gently for fifteen minutes in a skillet. Cut two cups celery in narrow strips and one cup onions in thin slices.

Remove the bean sprouts from a can of Sub Kum and set aside to add at the last. Remove the bamboo shoots and water chestnuts from this can and cut in thin slices, then in narrow strips. Add celery, onions, bamboo shoots, water chestnuts and a small piece of ginger root to the skillet together with the juice from the can and two cups soup stock. Cover and cook until celery and onions are tender. Add one tablespoon flour moistened with a little water, cook until slightly thickened, add one tablespoon brown sauce and more soy sauce, if desired. Add the bean sprouts and heat a few minutes. Serve with hot rice. Any other meat can be used instead of pork.

To convert this recipe into chow mein, open a can of chow mein noodles onto a pie pan and put it in the oven to crisp. Arrange the noodles on plates, place the chop suey over and—there is chow mein!

Polluted city water has enabled a typhoid patient to collect damages from the city of Albany, N. Y., for permanent injury to his health. A $3,000 verdict was awarded on the ground that the city contracts with each citizen to furnish unpolluted water and had failed to warn the people that such pollution existed.

Thirteen of the two hundred cases that occurred in the same typhoid outbreak filed notice of suit within the required period and may also bring suit. If the decision is upheld by the higher court, where the city intends to carry it, the case will establish an important precedent.
