Indian Weapon of War
The tomahawk is an ancient weapon universally used by Indians in war before they were taught the use of iron and steel, since which hatchets have been substituted for them. This instrument still retains its use and importance in public transactions and, like the pipe, is often very significant. This weapon is formed much like a hatchet, having a long stem or handle; the head is a round ball or knob of solid wood, well enough calculated to knock men's brains out. On the other side of the stem the head terminates in a point where the edge would be, which point is set a little hooking or coming toward the stem, and near the center, where the stem or handle pierces the head, another point projects forward of a considerable length, which serves for thrusting as with a spear or pike pole.
