Curious Flower

One of the most curious flowers in the world is a kind of convolvulus which is common in Bermuda. The strange thing about this blossom is that it changes color as the hours of the day pass. Soon after sunrise the flower opens and it is then a lovely rose-pink. As time passes the bloom takes on a mauve shade until by noon it is a rich blue. In the afternoon the blue becomes fainter and fainter until when darkness comes this astonishing blossom is quite white. Just before midnight the flower fades, and it is a mass of crumpled petals by the morning.

Land Elevations

A mountain is any elevation of land high enough to be very conspicuous in its surroundings. In general, an elevation higher than a hill and often rising with a comparative abruptness, but without great extent of surface at its summit. Popularly, the term is variously used; hills which rise 100 to 200 feet above essentially flat surroundings are sometimes called "mountains," as in southern New Jersey and the plains of Texas, while in a mountainous region, as near the Rocky mountains, elevations of 1,000 or 2,000 or more feet are called hills.
