Use of Veneer Is Age-Old Manufacturing Practice

Veneering is not a product of the machine age. It was used by the ancient Egyptians in making their furniture and has been considered the best manufacturing practice for more than 3,000 years.

The most beautiful figures in wood are often found in what is known as the "diseased" parts of the tree. That is, the tree may have been injured, developed a growth or some other "disfigurement" that gives to the cabinet-making trades some of the most beautiful patterns in wood design. These sections of the tree are carefully cut into sheets, glued into patterns by hundreds of pieces of strong tape and attached to the core wood. This is an extremely technical part of cabinet making and requires the services of a man well versed in the art.

If all table tops, for instance, were solid, they would not have near the attractiveness which veneers provide. One firm has a mahogany dining table the top of which looks like a ripple of stain ribbon, and furniture authorities have stated that this design probably would never appear again in all history.

With the present manufacturing processes there is little danger of solid wood warping. The only objection to solid-wood furniture is that it lacks the beauty of veneered furniture. The "straight wood," as it is called—generally taken from the trunk of the tree—is likely to be just what the name implies.

Moved to Idaho

On Wednesday of this week Eldon Boyer left for Nampa, Ida., where he and Mrs. Boyer expect to make their home. Mrs. Boyer having left Monday evening for Portland for a few days' visit and where she will join him. The Boyers have been living here for the past year and a half and he has been employed in the Willamina Clay Products Co., plant. They have made many friends since coming here and all regret their leaving and wish them success and happiness in their new home. Mr. and Mrs. Brandt, of Seattle, the new ceramic engineer at the brick plant, have rented the Boyer house and expect to move here the later part of the month.
