EDITORIAL COMMENTS

The state of confusion existing among the experts over the burning question of "Will there be a war soon?" can be judged by two articles appearing recently in leading serious magazines. Both articles were written by men of reputation, with a fair claim to being authorities on events abroad. One was entitled "There will be no war." The other was entitled "Hitler must fight."

One theory which is encouraging to the beleaguered democracies of Europe is that Hitler cannot afford a war for the reason that it would bring with it an excellent chance of revolution at home—and that Hitler knows this, even as he and other Nazi officials attempt to discredit it publicly. Certainly an excellent argument can be made in support of the theory. The Nazi regime has outlawed labor unions. It has fought the churches, especially the Catholic. It has imprisoned untold thousands of dissenters in concentration camps and executed many. It has driven other thousands into exile. The persecuted people have families, friends, connections. Not much is heard from these possible dissenters—the iron heel of the gestapo prevents that—but it is logical to believe that a substantial proportion of the German people hate the regime in power, and are waiting for the day when it may be destroyed.

In the countries which Hitler has subjugated—such as Austria and the Czech provinces—conditions are still worse from the Nazi point of view. Production in factories has slowed down, a tremendously expensive policing job has become necessary, and well supported accounts of sabotage are current.
