Worms not added to food we eat

In spite of rumors to the contrary, earthworms are not added to the foods that we buy, says Susan Gangler, Columbia County Extension agent.

The origin of these rumors is puzzling. Some consumers may have misinterpreted the name of an additive in cured meat products. Sodium Erythorbate (which has nothing to do with earthworms) is used to prevent fading of color in cured meats. It also improves the shelf life.

Earthworms have not been approved by the federal government for use as an ingredient in food, Ms. Gangler says. Federal regulations set standards which spell out the ingredients allowable in food products.

Even if worms could be added to food, it would not make much economic sense to do so. The limited worm supply commands a high price per pound.

Carolyn Raab, Oregon State University Extension foods and nutrition specialist, points out that the alarm about earthworms can be traced to our culture definition of acceptable food. Our culture basically defines what we shall consider food and for whom and under what circumstances.

Although earthworms are edible, we do not happen to consider them an acceptable food. However, in other cultures earthworms may be part of the daily diet. For instance, grubs (wormlike larvae of insects) are consumed in Central African countries.
