

13 miles south of Canyon City. It offers a shelter, ski slopes, but no tows.

Ski season at Mary's Peak in Siuslaw national forest, 24 miles west of Corvallis, ten miles off state highway 34 by forest road, carries on from January through March. A small public shelter is available, along with an observatory. A portable rope tow, 450 feet in length with a 60 foot rise, is operated by the Helenski ski club of Corvallis. Parking space provides for 250 cars.

Blue Mountain ski club from November through April operates three rope tows, from 400 to 1000 feet in length and rises from 50 to 350 feet, at Tollgate in Umatilla national forest on state highway 204 at Spout Springs mountain near Pendleton. A warming hut, ski rentals, meals and ski instruction are available. Parking space can handle 300 cars.

A portable ski tow is in use from time to time at the Whitebranch and Hand Lake areas in Willamette national forest near McKenzie Pass on U.S. highway 28. A public shelter is provided.

Two rope tows, 500 and 250 feet long, respectively, with rises of 100 feet and 50 feet, are in operation from December through April at Willamette Pass on state highway 58 in Willamette national forest at the summit of the Cascade mountains. A lunch counter, a small shelter, first aid room and parking space for 100 cars are available.

There's fun in the Oregon snows. But there are spills, too; even broken bones when skiers essay slopes beyond their ability in eagerness to sail like the wind down hills of glistening white.
