Abert Rim in southeastern Oregon's Lake county is described by geologists as one of the largest exposed faults in the world. Where the earth slipped vertically ages ago, the fault rises 2000 feet above the eastern edge of Abert lake with an 800 foot lava cap which ends in a sheer precipice.

Before the coming of white men, historians say what is now the state of Oregon was the home of more than 60 tribes of Indians. Most of them were west of the Cascade mountains. Today most Oregon Indians are contained within the Umatilla, Klamath and Warm Springs reservations, east of the Cascades.
