WHO'S WHO, AND WHY

club, and the Woman's Weekly, and last year's junior bulletin; and good English, and the little uneducated Hindus in India, with a host of other activities and hobbies, is something no loyal student cares to contemplate. It would be almost a calamity.

The initial "H" of Miss Hurley's name, singularly enough, is also the first letter of "hobbies". The coincidence is a happy one, for Miss Hurley and hobbies go together. Her friends say that since she came to Oregon three years ago, she has taken up and discarded more hobbies than most people ever heard of. Sometimes she will have three or four hobbies going at once; and as everyone knows what quarrelsome creatures different hobbies are apt to be, it speaks well for her executive ability that she has been able to manage them without a single accident. In fact her friends have only one fear in this direction; and that is that Miss Hurley will corral all the hobbies at Oregon and take them away with her when she graduates in June.

One of Miss Hurley's best known hobbies is being nice to everybody. And it is one she never discards. Her friends say that being nice comes as natural to her as her gift of reciting Shakespeare; what her enemies would say has never been learned, for the simple reason that nobody has ever heard of her having any enemies. Another of her principal hobbies is good English. Our latter day hodge podges of slang, and word corruptions, and coined expressions of the Kiplingesque variety, find small favor with Miss Hurley; in her own use of correct English, she is a purist in the best sense of the word.

Just at present the hobby that Miss Hurley is most enthusiastic over is the dramatic club. In this self-confident aggregation of nearly a hundred heroes, assistant heroes, villains and villainesses, curtain raisers, and supers, there is a quantity of real genius. But Miss Hurley is not content with having some of the University's dramatic talent in the club; she would like to have all of it there. For which reason it is a good deal of a compliment to have her ask, "Are you going to try out for the dramatic club?" It's a good sign you have talent in that direction.

Among the other hobbies of Miss Hurley may be mentioned "people without brains" and philosophy. One of her favorite pursuits is to discuss questions of deep philosophic import at the dinner table at the Gamma Phi Beta sorority, of which she is a prominent member; for which her seat has been dubbed "the philosophy corner." Miss Hurley also has a soft spot in her heart for the untutored youngsters of foreign climes. Not long ago she startled some of her sorority sisters by declaring her intention of going to India after her graduation to devote her life to teaching the young idea how to shoot in the minds of the thousands of little yearning unlearned Hindus there. At other times she has declared for Alaska, the Philippines, or Honolulu. It is possible she may go to Springfield.

Since graduating from Allen's prep school in Portland three years ago, Miss Hurley has played a pretty active part in co-ed politics at the University. Among other offices, she has held those of editor of last year's junior bulletin, literary editor of the junior annual, president of the dramatic club, and editor of the Woman's Weekly. It was in the last position that she won much fame by writing an editorial on hats which was widely copied.

Fortunately, Miss Hurley is not a woman suffragist; but if woman suffrage ever does become universal, she can be depended upon to be elected to some of the offices. And she will not have to nominate herself or make use of unusual efforts in her own behalf to bring it about, either.

his conscience, or drown his conscience and live easily ever after? These are a few of the more complicated ones.

This is how the millracing came about:

For some time it has been the wholesome custom at the Khoda Khan house to make the Freshmen wait on the tables. In a spirit of self-sacrifice one day, Lewis, young Jamieson, Hawkins and John Moore, those falling under the new rule, bound themselves by a sacred oath that the first one of their number to break a dish should ease his conscience by making a public dive into the millrace and then swimming across it. All went well until last Saturday.

On that day Arthur Lewis, who is studying to become a lawyer and consequently knows something about juggling, invited young Jamieson to enter a juggling contest. Having no law statutes handy to juggle with, in their enthusiasm the young men used plates. Before they knew it, one dish lay cruelly broken and mangled on the floor, a physical and mental wreck, its young life crushed in the very heyday of its flower. Under the pricking of a remorseful conscience, young Jamieson and Lewis decided there was nothing left for them but to fulfill the agreement and jump into the millrace.

Just at noon Monday, dressed in their oldest clothes and escorted by Harper Jamieson with a stop watch, Glen Briedwell with a rope, Bill Mott with a stewpan in lieu of a starter's pistol, and the rest of their fraternity brothers, the two walked with a steady tread to the bridge. As they slowly climbed upon the rail, Mott with his gong began to count.

"One, two, three—ready, bang!" As one man the two leaped into the water. According to Jamieson's stop watch it took them just five minutes more to swim across the stream and climb to the bank.

"As an easy remedy for an uneasy conscience, millracing beats 'em all," said Lewis to a Doughnut reporter, soon after leaving the river. After getting out of the water I felt as though I had never had a conscience."
