Further In- There was a time when suggestions concerning the novations expansion of our field of activities could be promptly met with the response that we were already attempting more than we could successfully handle, and as a result were overburdened. But now, with the growth of the University, a change is gradually taking place: the number of students is increasing, while the number of activities entered into remains practically the same as when we numbered only half our present enrollment. A sure sign of growth and prosperity in a University is the frequent introduction of new branches of activity. It shows that those in attendance are alive and energetic.

In our last issue, comment was made concerning the organization of a German Club, and of a dramatic club. Lately, decisive steps have been taken towards the promotion of a German Club and from present indications the organization, now well under way, will be a credit to the University. Why has a dramatic club not received similar attention? Surely not because of the lack of talent and of interest. Doubtless if such a club were organized, there would be a large number of applicants for membership, and it is highly improbable that, once begun, it would fail to hold its own with the other student-body enterprises.
