

INDUSTRIAL NOTES

William Burke is working on a set of hack harness.

The tailors are making underwear for the large boys.

Cyril Morrisette is now working in the harness department.

The carpenter boys are busy making sky-lights for the gym.

The blacksmiths are busy getting out the iron for the large "Gym."

The sewing room girls are expecting to have a party in the near future.

Harry Covington made a lunch box for Robert Cameron in the harness shop.

Thos. McCully and John Peazzoni are taking an invoice of the iron and steel on hand in the shop.

Mack Colby is working on the floor in the blacksmith shop shoeing horses. Mack will finish his trade this year.

Mack Colby has finished a hammer for his own use, and it is neatly finished. Mack is a very good blacksmith.

The blacksmiths are wishing that a wagon-maker would arrive in Chemawa so as they could get some wagons to iron.

Lawrence Pablo, who has been working in the blacksmith shop for the last two months, is highly praised by his instructor as a boy who is willing to learn. He is always on time and willing to do whatever he is told and is learning fast.

Joaquin Meadows, Sam McCush and Mack Colby do all the horse shoeing in the blacksmith shop. Mr. Mann says they are hard to beat.

TAILOR SHOP NOTES

It is a pleasure to witness the prompt arrival of all the boys in this department immediately after the whistle blows in the morning, proving that there is a live interest taken in this training preparation. After roll call (all present) we gather around the cutting table and select some boy to draft a garment while the balance watch the lesson, endeavoring to complete this task on or before 8 o'clock, then dismissing the class in garment designing we take up the constructive part of the work until the whistle blows to prepare for the noon-day meal when the boys are dismissed. This does not mean that there is a wild scramble to leave the shop, on the contrary, the exit is quiet and scattered, some not feeling satisfied to leave a work that interests them, remaining until obliged to go upon the sounding of the bugle to fall in.

This interest is the result of a painstaking effort upon the part of the student who feels and knows that he has accomplished something; he has performed a task of which he feels justly proud and is loth to leave it.

The tailor boys, after having been busy making four dozen suits of underwear for the medium-sized boys, are about through now and are ready for general work.

The girls of the Senior Class are taking practical lessons in meat-cutting. Mrs. Cooper takes them over to the butcher shop.
