

CUTTING TABLE CLIPPINGS.

The tailor shop is pleased to report the receipt of an order from the office to measure for, cut, trim and make a suit of clothes to order for each boy in the graduating class, such order to be filled before July 26, '08.

We are also instructed that each graduate may select such style of garment that his good taste may suggest, and we are pleased to note that these young men are well informed as to the correctness of present-day fashion by their choice of fashionable suits to be designed, cut, trimmed and made by the apprentices in the Chemawa tailor shop. It is under such circumstances that the result of patient and careful training, such as our grand industrial system affords, is made plain to those interested in the making of the mechanic of the near future.

A glimpse into the tailor shop at this time would convince anyone that these young boys are destined to make their way in the world by their knowledge of their chosen trade.

The cutting table is occupied by several boys whose ages vary from 14 to 16 years. They perform the skillful task of cutting these clothes for their fellow schoolmates, and later they will sit at a work bench and by their understanding of garment constructing manufacture the same into a stylish and presentable piece of work which in civil life would have a commercial value.

On the morning of July 1st, '08, this task was commenced and it was an experience for which I am thankful. There were present 16 boys who are competent, more or less, and seven youngsters, making a total of 23 boys present. Each boy was so intent upon his work that perfect order prevailed. It was a hopeful condition of things and was only another evidence that the busy boy becomes the desirable man.

There is nothing wonderful but that it might be more so. Niagara, for instance, would be far more marvelous if the water flowed the other way.—Ex.
