"Jump Off Joe."

her lovable disposition, the head chief of the Siletz took the girl and reared her as his own, while she grew in grace and mind until the fame of the fair-faced princess spread far and wide.

Time passed and the chieftain's son, Joe, ever near the adopted girl, was chained to her by the power of her many graces and wooed and won her hand. Joe filled the heart of the aged chieftain for his love was great, both for the boy, his son, and the girl, his ward by tribal adoption. But in the midst of the rejoicing, sorrow and death, like a creeping fog, spread over the land. Vast fires burned the forests, drove away the deer, the bear, the elk and other game; drouth dried up the leaping creeks, leaving the trout gasping in the shallows; crops withered and died, under a pitiless sun or were washed into the sea by sudden fierce torrents, quick fallen from a single cloud. In the midst of a tribulation the old chieftain, heart-broken at the woe of his people, sickened and died.

Wise men of the nation, skilled in the medicine of the gods, gathered in solemn conclave and besought the great spirit for a remedy for all the trouble
