Selling Hogs and Buying Pork Is Not a Profitable Practice for Farmers.

DIFFERENT WAYS OF CURING

Young Animals From 8 to 12 Months Old Are Best for Furnishing Home Meat Supply-Avoid Danger of Disease,

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.) Every farmer can well produce the pork and pork products which are consumed on his farm, for selling hogs and buying pork involves profits, but not to the farmer engaged in the prac-This point is brought out in Farmers' Bulletin 1186, published by the United States Department of Agriculture, which tells how hogs should be killed and describes different methods of curing and canning pork on the farm. Highly nutritious and palatable pork products for home use are easily ande, says the bulletin. Pork can be cured and canned in a number of ways and the variety of products affords a supplement to the daily meals.

Young Hogs Yield Best Meat. A hog of medium condition, gain-ing rapidly in weight, yields the best quality of meat. A reasonable amount of fat gives juiciness and flavor to the meat, but large amounts of fat are objectionable. Smooth, even, and deeply-fleshed hogs yield nicely-marbled ments. The meat of old hogs will be improved if they are properly fattened before slaughter, but young hogs from eight to twelve months old are best for furnishing the home meat time of killing. It is better to hold them entirely without feed for 18 to 24 hours prior to that time, but they should have all the fresh drinking water they want. It is essential to have the proper equipment for rapid and skillful work at killing time. Such equipment includes a straight sticking knife, a cutting knife, a 14-inch steel to keep the knives sharp, a hog hook for holding the animals, a bell-shaped stick scraper, a gambrel for holding the hog to facilitate cleaning and cutting the meat, and a meat saw. If the hog is not too large, a barrel is a convenient receptacle for scalding. Complete directions for killing and cleaning a hog, properly cutting the portions of ment, rendering lard, making sausage, smoking cured ment, and home canning of pork and pork products are described in the bulletin, copies of which can be obtained free on application to the Department of Agriculture.
