VERMONT FIRST TO PROHIBIT SLAVERY

An interesting account of the influence of the little state of Vermont on the history of the country is found in "The Spirit of Early Vermont," by Dr. Herbert H. Hines, pastor of the Woodstock Congregational Church in the current number of the National Republic.

"During the days of the revolution this was a state without a name and a people without a country or political status," Dr. Hines writes. "It was neither a crown colony nor was it represented in colonial congresses. Later it made a separate armistice with Great Britain. But it entered into the revolution, not only for the help of its fellow-Americans, but for its own self-preservation. At least in the history of this state, altruism and self-preservation have never been very far apart."

"A convention of 1777 called this territory "New Connecticut." Not until the Windsor convention in June, 1777, was a name seriously considered. It was suggested that there was a part of Pennsylvania called "New Connecticut," so at the advice of a citizen of Pennsylvania this state was called Vermont, from the Green Mountains; and no state is more appropriately named. In the Constitution House still seen in Windsor, a constitution was adopted modeled after William Penn's government. It is quite characteristic that it took only six days to form the government. A notable constitutional provision was the prohibition of slavery, the first of any provision of that kind."

TOO MANY LAWS OVERWHELMING AMERICANS

Americans are fairly overwhelmed by law because of the avalanche of legislation, according to Harold C. McGuigan, veteran Kansas attorney in an address made recently before the Kansas State Bar Association. Mr. McGuigan pointed out how Congress has been almost continually grinding out legislation for years and pointed out that there are now no less than 15,000 sections of the United States statutes. In addition to this there are more than 11,000 sections of the state statutes and he number is constantly increasing. He said in part: "These various statutes are so complex that two courts will seldom reach a like construction. The federal statutes reach such great number that no lawyer in America has a comprehensive knowledge of them. Some lawyers may be expert in finding them in the sense that some bird dog might be expert in finding quails, but these lawyers no more know the statutes than the bird dog knows the number of quail in the covey he is pointing."

Mr. McGuigan deplored the legal maxim which sets forth that ignorance of law is no excuse. In view of these volumes upon volumes of law, many of them beyond comprehension, he said it would be an absurdity to invoke the maxim and it does violence to reason.
