THE MOUNTAIN THAT SLID INTO THE OCEAN

A Story of the Japanese Earthquake
 There are ten thousand interesting things to write about but one in particular that young people might be interested in is about the mountain that slid into the sea.

There is a small village named Hayakawa (fast river) thirty miles from Tokyo that became popular all at once in 1923. After the great catastrophe which struck Tokyo and Yokohama had abated somewhat in the minds of the people they woke up to the fact that a mountain had moved five miles and deposited itself somewhere in the bottom of the Pacific Ocean. One's mind hardly knows how to go about even imagining such a seemingly impossible thing. Yet it happened. I saw its tracks!

Last fall when "mikan" (small oranges) were getting ripe on the slopes of Japan, a number of Boy Scouts and their leader went out to see this sight or all that was left to see. Mr. Cunningham and I also featured in the expedition. The scenery was great! Everything was new and different, quaint yet very much alive. We rode to within about five miles of our destination on a slow train and as the boys were hankering for action we walked on in. Our lunch tasted good as we sat on a high bluff overlooking the broad Pacific, watching the fishermen drawn in their great trawls on the beach below, basking in the autumn sunshine and with ripe "mikan" hanging close to our heads!

Then we pushed on to the sights. When we reached the village we found that all the stone walls (of which there are thousands in Japan) were badly cracked by the earthquake and a great side of the hill had slid into the sea carrying with it some of the village. This made us expectant. We passed along the one main street only a few hundred yards and we came to where it suddenly ended in a sharp drop-off. From there we could look up and down a large valley that had been recently gouged out by some terrific force. Awe doesn't often hold a boy for very long so we were soon finding our way down a narrow path into the yawning canyon to see more of this thing. We followed the path that led up the river bed toward the source of the slide and every corner greeted us with a surprise.

They say that when it happened, it happened quickly. The earthquake came with a terrible jolt, an up and down motion shaking everything loose from its foundation then shook violently from side to side. Many of the hills and larger mountains here are full of volcanic fissures, hot spring channels and often are just great heaps of volcanic matter very unlike American granite cliffs. The one of which I speak was not a great mountain like Mt. Hood, but must have been a great hill, nevertheless. It was projecting menacingly from another larger mountain and a river from either side of it joined at its foot. In fact it was right in line to get shoved off. A heavy rain made everything slippery and swelled the rivers. The violent shock jarred the mountain loose and sent it tumbling into a massive land slide down the canyon like mad. It carried farms, houses, railroad bridge and half the town with it, sloping up on one side of the canyon and then up on the other as it rounded the bends, then split the waters of the bay and gushed in with a roar to be swallowed up by the Pacific.

We heard all these details from the people who saw it as it happened in broad daylight. All we saw, however, was its track. Even that showed what an immense thing it had been. (It was no mere cow's track. Cows are kept tied up in Japan). We returned feeling that we had seen something really unusual and people are still travelling to Hayakawa to see if a mountain really did slide into the sea as was reported.

R. W. ISAACSON.
