THE MEXICAN OIL CONTROVERSY

The papers are full of the Mexican oil controversy, all growing out of the enforcement of the Mexican constitutional law regulating oil and mineral land. The law says that all such lands must belong to the government and those that are occupying these lands must transfer their titles to these lands for governmental concessions. They had opportunie time to make the necessary adjustments. Nearly all of the forcign owners of these lands have complied with the law in this respect. Some of the American owners of oil properties have not done so and say they are going to try to hold their titles through court action. They seem to be minded to test out the fact as to whether Mexican constitutional law regulating oil and mineral land. They seem to be minded to test out the fact as to whether Mexico has a right to make laws to govern her country. Secretary of State Kellogg is considering whether the United States should break diplomatic relations with Mexico in order to force them to acknowledge the rights of the land owner over the government. One article said he was even considering raising the embargo on arms, thus permitting the revolutionary factions to ship in arms and thereby embarass the present government in Mexico. According to a statement made by the President of Mexico, only those who are holding these lands on a bona fide title acquired by purchase from the Mexican government. If this is the case why not let the Mexican government. If this is the case why not let the Mexican grain and superior lien thereon, and superior lien thereon and superior lien thereon, and superior lien thereon and superior lien thereo government. If this is the case why not let the Mexican government work out her own laws. We would not relish the fact of some other nation butting in and telling us how to administer our laws.

GOOD WILL INDUSTRY

The Methodist churches in Fortland are about to establish one of the Good Will industries which that church is operating in many of the largest cities of the country. They have these institutions in Seattle and many other cities on the coast, and they are being operated successfully. They establish workshops where old articles of wearing apparel are reconditioned and made fit for many more days wear. By doing this they give work to many of the down and outs and those who have become street beggars and many times get them in the position where they are independent and earning a good livelihood, The down and out has the privilege of good food and a place to sleep, besides earning wages. Many people who have been dregs in the social life of the country become acquainted with the Spirit of Christ and have been led to a self-respecting Christian life through the influence of these industries. They put out serviceable garments at a price that the poor people can afford to have enough clothes to make themselves comfortable. The following are some of the figures taken from an editorial in the Oregon Journal: "Thirty-six of such industries gave a third of a miltion days' work and paid more than $1,000,000 to the otherwise unemployed in America last year." Is not such as this worthwhile? Such an enterprise as this operated by any church, is practical applied Christianity.
