THE DESERTED FARM HOUSE

(Frances Belle Delzell)

The old house stands in green meadows,
 Where soft sheltering elm-tree leaves
 Cast themselves down thru the shadows
 Over rank grass and rotting eaves.

Thru ragged broken paths wild myrtle,
 Weaves a carpet blue—star strewn,
 From the bridal-wreath an oriole
 Trilled a lonesome little tune.

Against the broken kitchen window
 One white filigee bending low,
 Waved a long plume in the dimness,
 Like a white hand to-and-fro.

Beckoning to some one who once
 Greeted its beauty with delight,
 And placed little children in chairs,
 And tucked them in gently at night.

Then sweet lilies bending to see—
 Like a caress gentle finger meet—
 Now—the winds blow down its petals
 Adrift white shroud at its feet.

The heart of the old house, the old fire-place
 In the old sitting room waits alone,
 For the loved that never gather
 Around the cold black hearth-stone.

A swift climbing, calling, stairway
 Winds to sleepy rooms of creak and sigh,
 As if the spirits of lost children,
 Had slipped home for one last good cry.
