FARM REMINDERS

The condition known as blossom end rot or point rot of tomatoes is not due to any kind of fungus or bacterial parasite, but rather to excessive evaporation from the foliage, reports the Oregon Experiment station. It is especially troublesome where abundant foliage development due to rich soil and plenty of moisture, is followed by hot dry weather. This may be avoided to some extent by moderate watering early in the season, and providing for adequate moisture supply right through the season.

It is important that the Bordeaux mixture used for peach blight control be of the best quality, so that it will adhere throughout the entire fall period, and that it be applied as soon as possible after the crop is removed from the trees, says the Oregon Experiment station. Printed instructions for making this spray may be secured from county agents, or from Oregon State college.

That age and health of the animal affect both the weight and strength of the fleece, as well as mutton production, is a fact carefully considered by the wool grower in culling his flock, says the Oregon Experiment station. It is believed that length and density mean less shrinkage after clipping. Fineness of fiber is also an important consideration.

Cyst formation of chicken is a condition which occurs occasionally in most any flock, and is not of an infectious nature, says the Oregon Experiment station.
