THE AMERICAN HOME

By Job E. Manfred
(All rights reserved)

In a discussion of so momentous a subject as that of the American home and its bearing on our entire national life, it is well to realize that there are many angles from which it must be viewed. We must also bear in mind that no two persons think exactly alike, and that there are consequently, many conflicting opinions, first, as to the existence of a real problem in the premises; second, regarding the probable causes; and third, "what can be done about it."

Now, as to the first, it is merely necessary to point out that, during the past three years, no one subject has been more seriously discussed in the public prints than the present status of the American home and its seeming trend towards total disappearance.

A highly marititious magazine, entitled "The American Home," devoted almost exclusively to the making of better homes, in its October, 1928, issue, printed an illuminating article under the caption, "A House or a Home?" The author, Edward W. Bok, was for many years the editor of the Ladies Home Journal, and is exceptionally well qualified to speak with authority on matters pertaining to the home.

He says: "It is not the furniture that makes the home, but the atmosphere in the house that at once exhales the home feeling, put there by both the wife and the husband. There is a mistaken notion that woman creates a home. She does, in a large sense, because she is its mistress and spends a large portion of her time in it. But the husband contributes too. Making a home is not a single, but a joint affair. The wife cannot do it alone, but jointly with her husband's help she can." Then he goes on to tell how many husbands use their homes merely as places in which to eat and sleep. How they rush out in the morning, to be gone all day, returning at the close of a business day to eat a hurried meal, and then rush out again to their clubs, or lodges, or some other occupation in which the wives have no part. Such husbands, he contends, contribute nothing to the home atmosphere. Unquestionably, he is right; but the same reasoning applies with equal force to the wives. These must be intelligent team work, on a strictly "fifty-fifty" basis, or the house will fall far short of being a home in the true sense of the word.

In the foregoing reflections no mention has been made of the possible presence of children. The obligation, resting upon husbands and wives, to exert themselves to make the house a home, for the comfort and enjoyment of both, becomes a solemn duty when the responsibility of parenthood is assumed. A child's birthright is the right to home and home surroundings in the highest sense of the words. To establish and maintain these constitute a sacred obligation upon both parents which neither one may shirk. This, of course, implies a willingness to sacrifice. No one has a right to bring children into the world unless fully prepared and determined to live up to the covenant which is thereby entered into with a divine creator.

Editor's Note:—This is the second of a series of articles on the American Home to be published in The Turner Tribune, the first of which appeared in last week's issue. Our subscribers are invited to comment on these articles, giving their opinions and, possibly, relating some personal experiences tending to show the drift of present day family life from the reader's point of view. No letters or comments will be printed without the consent of the writer. If publication is intended, the letter must be limited to 100 words or less and written on one side of the paper only.

why smokers graduate to

CAMELS

The phrase "I've Graduated to Camels" originated with a Camel smoker. It expresses the experience of millions who through Camels have learned to know real smoking pleasure.

As taste in smoking develops, it naturally leads toward better quality. New smokers may not be critical but when they once experience the true mildness and surpassing fragrance of the Camel blend, they realize that here is a real superiority. It is for smokers of such discernment that Camels are made . . . for them the choicest tobaccos are selected . . . and this quality is maintained for the millions who know genuine smoking pleasure.
