THE AMERICAN HOME

By Job L. Manfred
(All rights reserved)

"I think of the home as a ship on the sea of life. When the wedding ceremony is over and the home is established, the great adventure is well under way, with the passengers aboard. Every home-maker is a pilot traveling over calm or troubled waters, steering, exploring, discovering." Thus has Nell Nichols, in her delightful little essay on "Little Journeys in Home-making," very aptly described the beginnings of most American homes. Unfortunately, however, there are indications on all sides of an increasing tendency to desert the ship, and even to scuttle it, when the great adventure does not come up to expectation, when disillusionment transforms the beautiful dream of an ideal home into a hideous nightmare.

Such wrecks are deplorable, even though there be no children to consider, because every breaking up of a home is just another crack in the foundation of our republic.

If, as one of our leading statesmen has put it, "no nation is better than the homes that comprise it," then it must be evident to even the least observant that the importance of maintaining American home life in its traditional aspect cannot possibly be overemphasized.

All this applies with much greater force to the status of a family which has been augmented by the advent of one or more children; and is, thereby, presumed to become more firmly bound together and more deeply woven into the fabric of our national life. When such a family is wrecked, no matter what the cause may be, it surely is to be deplored. When number of them go the same way, it becomes tragic, indeed. What then shall we say when we are told by trustworthy authorities, that there is an unmistakable and widespread trend in that direction? And then, when we are also told that this has already resulted in "a painfully obvious and indisputable 'wave of crime';" that apparently authentic statistics show a marked increase in juvenile and adolescent delinquency, and that sociologists, educators and others look upon the break-down of the American home as the most serious matter before the public at this time," it begins to assume the aspect of a national calamity.

That such a situation actually exists is no longer to be denied. But, not everyone knows it, and many do not believe it. In subsequent articles I shall present statements of recognized authorities and such newspaper and other reports as will enable the reader to do some intelligent thinking for himself.

When citizens begin to think, problems are on the way to solution.

Stern Discipline

Authorities of the university very properly make a disciplinary example of the quartet who have acknowledged responsibility for mischievous defacement of campus buildings at Corvallis.

Instead of suspension or expulsion—usual punishment for similar offenses—the culprits will remain at the university, but on probation throughout their underclass years. They will be under the personal supervision of the dean of men, to whom they must frequently report. They are denied the use of an automobile and are each fined eight scholastic hours. In addition, they must surrender themselves to the court at Corvallis for such additional penalties as it may impose.

There is apparently a strong desire on the part of both schools to bring to a summary end the vandalism which made its damaging appearance both at Corvallis and Eugene.

It is that desire which has inspired the drastic punishment meted out in this case, and its educational influence on the campus will be much greater if the disciplined students remain to remind their fellow students of their own folly, rather than go home and leave the whole incident to be soon forgotten.

We agree with the governing body of the university that the situation calls for stern measures, but as a matter of principle, we must differ with the judgment that fines a student "scholastic hours" for anything else than scholastic failure. Work done is work done, and cannot be undone by a faculty decision.

If the idea is rather to exact additional hours of school work as a penalty, it implies an indignity to scholarship and the whole educational process.

The university should at least maintain the fiction that learning is something to be desired, rather than something to be regarded as a punishment for our sins.—Portland Telegram.

Commendable Efforts

Through the efforts of the National Dairy Council and local dairy councils, the consumption of milk has increased over 30 per cent, or one-third of a quart per capita per day, since the beginning of systematic effort to advise the people of the necessity and the value of milk and its products.

This increase amounts, in round numbers, to over $500,000,000 annually to the dairy farmers. In the 12 years we have increased our population approximately 18 millions of people. This, with the increased per capita consumption of dairy products, means that we are consuming billions of pounds more milk a year and with the national dairy herd containing over one million less cows.

It would do no harm to reflect upon what a tremendous advantage it is to the dairy industry to meet the increased demands of the growing population and what has been accomplished through improved methods of breeding, selecting, feeding, and handling of our dairy herd. A million less cows to milk, feed, and care for, but with improved methods of dairying, the increased production of the remainder of the herd is meeting the increased demands. This shows conclusively that the effort to obtain better cows and to give them the right kind of feed and care has been successful—Hoard's Dairyman.

Public Land Bill

Senator McNary has a bill before the senate calling for the cession of a million acres of forest land to the State of Oregon. This land is a part of the national forests. The proceeds of the sale of this land, according to the bill, are to be used for the creating of a state capitol building fund. The present capitol building coupled with the supreme court building and the new state office building should accommodate the state government for years to come.

It would be more for the benefit of the state to apply the proceeds towards the replenishment of the state school funds, badly depleted by the sale of the school land to timbermen in years past. This land, as near as can be found, was sold outright to the timbermen in place of remaining in the hands of the state and the revenue being applied towards building up a permanent school fund.

There is another angle to this question which is that of the cost of protecting it from fire. It costs the government thousands of dollars annually to fight forest fires. If the state took over the title to this land this cost would involve on the state. Another matter is that of building roads. Under the present plan the forest service builds the roads through the national forests. This would probably be another cost item to revert on the state. These questions all deserve earnest consideration before making a transfer of this kind.

Senator McNary Backs Willamette

United States Senator Charles L. McNary is in line for the position of Republican floor leader in the senate. Senator McNary, senior senator from Oregon, has risen rapidly by hard work and loyal service to his Constituency, to the point where he is the acknowledged leader of the senate. Senator McNary is one servant of the State of Oregon who does not wear out with service. He continues his untiring efforts for the state of Oregon and the country at large. Perhaps he does some things that are deserving of criticism. If he did not he would be the perfect man. One thing he is at present working hard upon one that is of vital interest to the state of Oregon and the Willamette Valley is a survey of the Willamette river from Portland to Albany with the view of making up-river navigation possible. River navigation is on the increase in the eastern states and is slowly spreading to the west. It started with the Mississippi Warrior line as a war measure, which has since become permanent. Originally the Mississippi division extended from St. Louis to New Orleans. At present it extends north to St. Paul and improvements are under way that will carry it up the Ohio beyond the present head of navigation, and also on the upper Missouri. What has proven successful in the Mississippi valley will prove the same in the Willamette valley, and senator McNary should have the backing of the citizens of this section of Oregon in the big work he is doing.
