WHY WE BEHAVE LIKE HUMAN BEINGS

By GEORGE DORSEY, Ph. D., LL. D.

How and Why Bodies Fossilize UNLESS well protected, or in rainless Peru or Egypt, or in dry caves, or the cold storage of Arctic ice, or in oil, wax, or amber, the body soon yields to the bacteria of decay or to the teeth of wolves and hyenas For bone or other tissue to be replaced by mineral whereby it petrifles or "fossilizes," many conditions must be right. The wiser the animal, the less He was visiting the newlyweds at home. Everything was fine. likelihood of its being caught in quicksands or engulfed by the gravel and "Why did you take an apartment silt of floods. Primitive man was as with such a tiny kitchenette, Tom, old little enamored as we are of being > Fossil remains of the famous Cro-Magnon man have been found in Wales, and especially in France. Possibly earth never saw finer built human beings. His brain was 15 per cent larger than ours , his stature taller than any living race by two inches. He was clean-limbed, lithe, and swift. He had a good chin, thick and strong jaws. His head was long, his face broad. He buried his dead. He was an artist and an artisan. He lived about 25,000 years ago. Did he become an ordinary European, or did he disap pear? No one knows.

> Beyond Cro-Magnon, our forebears rather run to brutish casts. Grimaldi man was of the Negrold type. Neanderthal man had a huge head, chipped flint, and buried his dead. He is set down at 50,000 B. C. and left no known heirs. He is the first known

> The jaw of Heldelberg man fits a gorilla, but the teeth are ours. He is possibly 400,000 years old. Plitdown man is possibly a hundred thousand years ider. Some think he was an ape. Some say he was the first Englishman. We have reached a point in time where no one knows who's who.

The champion fossil is Pithecanthropus erectus (ape-man erect), discovered by Dubois in Java in 1891. He is certainly a half million years old; some say a million. He is more pithecold than any known human being, more anthropoid than any known ape. He was as erect and almost as tall as the average European. He had definitely left the "well-ventilated arboreal tenements." He was a lowbrowed moron-and may be represented in the living flesh. But whether he was of the direct line that led to man, or only of a line that ended with himself, is not yet definitely known. It is enormously significant that, after (reading paper)-It's a a debate lasting more than a quarter shame! Simply revolting! Down in of a century, the biologists of the the South Sea Islands a man pays world cannot decide whether Pithecanthropus erectus belongs to the first Hubby -Yes, that's a lot of money, or the second of the earth's First but if she is pleasant and good look-Families. That makes him a pretty ing and a willing worker she might good link that is no longer missing.

To import monkeys for their sex glands is ghastly business, perhaps the lowest that has engaged the cupidity and lust of man, but to shoot down simians as we do mad dogs or boys in uniform is a crime. The four Anthropold apes are our next-of-kin-living; they should be respected as cousins and not exterminated as vermin or Hubby-You told me to buy a dozen Indians.

> Man was never a gorilla, a chimpanee, an orang, or a gibbon. No bio ogist ever made such a claim. Wheth er these apes could have developed into human beings is a different story. They have the makings-all the parts. If we knew how heredity works and could control variation, we might breed from an ape a being that could dig a ditch, play the plano, talk English, and sing the "Messiah." We can teach them to smoke cigarettes, chew tobacco, drink beer, wear clothes, and eat with a knife and fork. We do not yet know the limit of their capacity to learn human ways.

> Why do zoologists put these four apes so close behind us that we can feel their breath and they can catch our diseases? Because they are Anthropoid. Nothing has yet surpassed them in the race to become human Their anatomy, embryology, histology. morphology, paleontology, physiology. and psychology entitle them to second place in the Ancient and Honorable Order of Firsts.

> They vary in their man-likeness; no one is in all ways closest to man. The orang looks like an Irishman; the gorilla is built like Jack Dempsey the chimpanzee is the most angelic; the delicate gibbon has a lady-like skull and an upright carriage. The first three-the Great Apes-are the extremes of variation from a generalized ancestor. T' gibbon varies least, and to that extent is nearest the tree man climbed down when he decided to stand up and talk. Except in teeth, the young female gorilla is the most human. Her fa-ther is a brute in size and appearance. Only five feet high, he may weigh over 400 pounds; mostly neck, chest, and arms. If his legs were of human proportions, he would stand over seven feet high.

The chimpanzee, like the gorilla, lives in jungle Africa. Like the gorilla, he has a shuffle-along gait, swinging his body between his long crutch like arms. He has the gorilla's propor tions, but never the great bulk of chest. And so is more at home in the trees, where he builds his nest, as does the orang. The chimpanzee's skull is not unlike the one ape-man erect tried on when turning into man -and gave up because it had too much jaw for the teeth required and not enough brain-box for ideas.

essels May Be Older Than St. Patrick's Time

An interesting archeological discovery was made by men clearing an old ditch at Mornington, county Louth, Ireland, a village at the mouth of the

with St. Patrick, who in 432, after unsuccessful efforts to effect a landing in other parts of Ireland, entered the Boyne there and ran his vessel into what was then known as the harbor at Colps, now called Colp. In a ditch into which within living memory the Boyne used to flow, forming a natural harbor, workmen unearthed the timbers of several oaken vessels lying at an angle to the stream and apparently of great age. length of the vessels cannot be ascertained until after further excavations.

The fact that sandy soil will preserve oak for thousands of years opens up the possibility that the vessels may be even older than St. Patrick's time. Steps have been taken to protect them until they have been seen by an archcological expert.
