MILK PRODUCTION MOST IMPORTANT

Poor Economy to Substitute Feed for Shelter.

Feed given the dairy cow should be used for milk production and body maintenance rather than as a substitute for proper housing.

"When cows are unduly exposed to bad weather, a large part of their ration is used to keep their bodies warm, leaving only a small portion for milk production," asserts John A. Arey, dairy extension specialist at the North Carolina State college. "Every effort should be made to keep the cows comfortable during the disagreeable periods. If this is not done, profits will be reduced. It is poor economy to substitute feed for shelter at any time."

Arey believes the cow stall should be well lighted, nicely bedded and properly ventilated but free from air currents. He says he has seen many cow barns and sheds in the state of such poor construction that they afford little protection against the cold winter wind. The sides of the barn or shelter should be made tight with the air being admitted through properly located windows.

The practice also of requiring cows to wade through mud and ice to secure drinking water is expensive. This kind of exposure chills the cow's body and prevents her from drinking the amount of water needed for good milk production. A cow weighing from 800 to 900 pounds and producing about 30 pounds of milk a day needs from 80 to 90 pounds of water each day. She will not drink this amount unless it is convenient and of medium temperature, says Mr. Arey.

Practical Dairyman Is Admirer of Modern Barn

The modern dairy barn is as far removed almost from the old cow stable in use a third of a century ago as is mechanical power from that furnished by a yoke of oxen in pioneer days. A well ventilated, well lighted barn equipped with a concrete floor, adjustable stalls that can easily be kept clean and in strictly sanitary condition, truly is an inspiration to the practical dairyman. With proper ventilation, not only can the foul air be removed, but also the excess moisture that used to accumulate in the old stables. This means better herd health and more economical use of feed by the cows. Plenty of sunshine and fresh, pure air are two of the most important factors not only for the health of the cow, but also for the conversion by her of feed into milk and butterfat.

Colostrum Is Helpful to Newborn Calves

A new-born calf should always be given the opportunity to suck its dam at least once so as to get the colostrum which nature has especially prepared for it. This colostrum is laxative in character and also contains some stimulating products which help to start the digestive system into activity. If for any reason it is impossible to give the colostrum to the calf, it should be given one ounce of castor oil shortly after birth and before it is given any food. After that the calf may be given milk from any cow if the mother's milk is not available.
