The Next War

Speaking to a large London audience British Foreign Secretary Arthur Henderson implored support for plans to reduce military and naval armament. He painted a terrible picture of what the next war would be like.

"The next war will not be like the last," he declared. "It will be incomparably worse. A great military expert has said that in the last war we were killing by retail but next time we shall do it by wholesale. The next war, if it ever should come, will be fought by aircraft and by aircraft using poison gas.

"Every year our air force carries out maneuvers over London. Have you ever thought what those maneuvers mean? They mean that our staff, like every other staff, is now expecting that the operations of the next war will be all attacks against great centers of industry and civilian populations.

"It is useless to protest that such warfare would be international crime. We have surely learned that it is beyond our power to humanize the conduct of modern war. Once war begins no man and no government can control it. The only way to stop such barbarities is to stop war itself."

While some of these details can be exaggerated, all thinking people agree that the next war will be horrible in its effect upon entire populations. The recognition of this should add strength to any movement to avoid war.

So far as we have been able to observe the modern flappers are able to take care of themselves, and, at the same time, two or three times as many men.

Every once in a while a newspaper editor finds a sensible subscriber, for example, the one that wrote us last week that The Turner Tribune was better than ever.

Maybe the reason the city dwellers are moving into the rural sections is because they have been reading the big bankers, who declare that there is "plenty of money in the country."

The highest compliment that a business man can pay an individual is to sell on credit; if some Turner merchant has done this with you, why not strain a point and make him a payment on the account? He probably needs it.

The Coca Cola company reports the biggest earnings in history and then narrates that it spent an extra million dollars on advertising in 1930.

Personally, we regret to see by the papers that people are still dropping into cold water through thin ice.
