Timberlick Or The Two Girl Hunters

Chapter III

As the thoughts were running through his head he saw another trapper not 50 yards away whom he recognized as Red Mike.

Red Mike was so called on account of his red hair and red complexion. He was a short heavy set Irishman.

He said to Timberlick, "Them shavages were sure after your skip that time."

"Yes," said Timberlick "if it hadn't been for you they would of had a pretty good chance."

"I saw they had some white man at bay," said Red Mike. "I was out for some fresh meat for my breakfast, and as I came up over the hill I sees them savages."

"Well, you'd beetter come over to my shack for breakfast," said Timberlick.

"Not today, Timberlick. I will have to pack in some groceries, so I will have to start out early."

"All right," said Timberlick. "We will go and get breakfast so we can get over our trap line."

"I went over my line twice yesterday, so they will be all right until I get back from town."

"Well, don't forget my tobacco."

"No chance, Timberlick, for I need some tobacco myself."

"Well, so long Mike."

"So long, Timberlick."

"Well," said Timberlick to Budge, "That boy Red Mike saved our lives and that's sartin'."

As Timberlick walked on toward his shack he still had his mind on fresh meat for breakfast and also to watch for Indians, which was the one thing they always had to do. He finally got a shot at a wild turkey, which he knew would be plenty for himself and Budge.

After their morning meal was over he said, "Well, Budge, we'll get Old Calamity and get to our traps. We might get another Injun or two and maybe a pelt or two."

They started out after they had locked the house, which was their custom on account of Indians.

Their first trap had a large lynx in it. Timberlick had a good catch that day.

After his last trap had been carefully reset, he returned to his shack and began to take the skins off the varmints. Budge was outside resting up after his trip. Timberlick was in the shack.

He had a fire started in his stove, when Budge growled.

What did Budge growl at?
