

Plucked Eyebrows

For the benefit of any curious masculine unsophisticate who has wondered idly concerning those two faint little lines bowing up over the orbs of the average lady, we'll oblige him by informing him that they're eyebrows. Not as once were, but a la mode. No, they didn't grow that way of their own accord. They are femininity's contribution to the world of experimentation in this business of regeneration or second birth.

Like other ordeals of birth, that of the eyebrow may be listed along with other painful and tortuous physical evolutions. In the early days of the innovation one furtively admired the few "plucky" pioneers of her set, while trying to muster courage for the plunge. Then one day, having previously invested in a hefty pair of tweezers, she went into the bedroom, locked the door and, wheeling the dresser over by the bay window, leaned up close to the glass and started in.

The first victim selected was probably a stray maverick growing down too far upon the eyelid. A good grip on it and pull—pull—pull! Merciful heaven, who ever thought they stuck so tightly! Yank! There, it's out at last. But when it let go with a jerk and came loose, roots and all, a big tear went splashing down one's nose. When! Plain to be seen that this was to be no pleasure picnic, but no use in backing down now.

After an hour of pulling, tugging, yanking and wincing, accompanied by a continual deluge of big tears splashing down the sides of one's nose, the change was made—such as it was. Below, on the dresser top, lay most of one's defunct eyebrow shrubbery. And there in the mirror, arching above bleary, tear-reddened eyes, straggled two little rainbow formations, survivals of the fittest.

The alarming feature of the situation, however, was the presence of two big angry looking evolved eyebrows. Hm—m! Further marred by a nose flushed and shiny from so much pseudo-weeping and swollen tear-reddened eyes, one's facial lineaments were a mess. Only one thing to do—plaster cold cream over the whole territory and go to bed. Maybe by morning it would look better.

By next day matters were considerably improved and one went around trying not to act self conscious, but feeling all the time as though wearing a pair of new shoes that squeaked.

Like everything else, plucking eyebrows has grown into a routine along with manicuring nails and brushing teeth. One has to keep everlastingly at it, but as a rule firsute sprouts that have been put through the mill a time or so will give up the ghost without so much as a struggle and fewer tears are shed in the ordeal as time goes on. Since it's the thing to do, everyone tweezes and it is an enterprising hair indeed that can get and maintain a foothold on any lady's facial expression these days.

Oh yes, one thing more—after plucking until one's eyebrows are nearly wiped off the slate, an eyebrow pencil is used to darken and accentuate what is left. Why? Oh, to make them show plainer, of course!
