Kite Flying Hazards Explained

Kite flying season is approaching with the warmer days of spring. Officials of Mountain States Power company are cooperating with local safety organizations in an effort to prevent serious accidents which occasionally happen as the result of kite flying.

C. M. Brewer, vice-president and general manager of the company, today declared, "It is not our desire to unduly alarm children nor their parents over the dangers of kite flying. However, it is our civic duty and our desire to cooperate always in every possible manner to assist in the prevention of accidents. It is for this reason that we respectfully call to the attention of parents that it is dangerous for kites to be flown near electric or telephone lines and especially so when metal strips are used in building kites and when many kind of wire is used for kite string or tails of kites. It is also dangerous for kites to be flown in a thunder storm for a wet cord or wire may act as a conductor for the electricity generated by such a storm. It is very dangerous for children to attempt removal of a kite tangled in electric transmission lines and particularly for them to climb poles after their kites.

"It is the policy of our organization to guard against accidents of all kinds. However, it is necessary that we ask the cooperation of parents and teachers in informing children of the hazards incurred through carelessness or lack of information so far as the dangers of kite flying are concerned."
