Anniversary Of Atrocity

Those who remember the eventful days from 1914 to 1918 are still convinced that the United States would have preserved its neutrality to the end of the World war had there been no Lusitania atrocity, of which May 7 is the sixteenth anniversary.

Although the United States did not enter the war until two years after the sinking of the Lusitania, this outrage against American neutrality and every humane law was the first of that contumacious of events which culminated in the crystallization of public opinion in this country against the central powers and, finally, a declaration of war.

Meditations on this tragedy of the war convince one that there is a justice which sometimes grinds swiftly. The civilized world felt that a nation guilty of such a crime could not win the World war, and Germany did not win.

Have the nations of the world learned the lesson of the sinking of the Lusitania? Has it been impressed upon the people of the world that there are humane laws to be obeyed even in time of war and that disobedience of these laws spells disaster? It was the wrath of the civilized world aroused by this atrocious act that won the war against Germany.

Even at this late day the deliberate murder of 1396 innocent non-combatants by command of a war-crazed U-boat captain seems by far more terrible and inexcusable than the slaughter of the millions of combatants who lost their lives in the World war. War-guilt may not rest upon Germany alone, but Germany alone must answer for the most fiendish crime of the war—the sinking of the Lusitania.

Education's Cash Value

There is no fixed measure of the relative value of trained men and of untrained men. The dean of a Boston college fixes the average minimum income of the high school graduate at $2200, and of the college graduate at $6000. His figures may be accurate as averages, but there are untrained men earning more than trained men, and there are trained men earning more than other trained men.

But it is averages in which the world is interested. Two who have gone through the same curriculum may be poles apart in the use they make of their minds. One man owes more to mother-wit than the books could teach him. But he who goes farthest absorbs theory and learns from practice, too. The most skillful craftsman at the work bench does not pour contempt on technical literature, but consults it at every opportunity, knowing where to put his finger on the reference he wants.
