CHAPTER XX.

Cornered. The ensign in the bow of the naval launch scanned the coast line, with "This Crooked Crag hotel is an uncanny place," he said. "They've probably got lookouts posted everywhere. We'd better land half a mile away and take them from the rear."

His brother ensign grunted. "Dollars to doughnuts we're on a wild goose chase," he said. "If there's any place that covers up its tracks it's Crooked Crag. 'You're right though, we'll take them from the rear."

They landed half a mile up shore and as quietly as possible tramped for a mile through underbrush in the general direction of the granite rock which stood out clear above the tree tops. They halted on the edge of the clearing, from the center of which rose the hotel itself.

"Form a circle," said the ensign, "surround the place, and all close in at once. No matter what happens, don't let anybody get away."

One of the ensigns beckened to Neal. "Come with me," he said, "you know the man we're after and can describe him. I'll need you and about three more besides."

With rhythmic, ringing steps, the little squad crossed the clearing, darted up the rustic staircase and tramped across the veranda of the hotel. Solinger met them at the door.

"Yes," gentlemen," he said, bowing, "what can I serve you?"
"Serve us nothing." sald the ensign sternly. "We are looking for a smuggler that you have got. He is here. We know he is here and we are going to get.him." Meantime Hernandez had entered the room where he had confined Annette. Once more he locked the door behind him and without a word crosses the floor toward her. Annette had made up her mind just what to do. She must fight with a woman's weapons and she had a woman's weapon-

She waited until Hernandez was within three feet of her, then she raised the weapon and sunk it deep into his outstretched arm.

His face white with anger, Hernandez caught her roughly by the throat. But he had forgotten something—for-gotten that she had inherited tremendous strength. Young and graceful as she was, her every muscle was well trained. With one strong sweep of her arm, she threw him off and the plunged into a fight, the fight of a wildcat against a wolf. She tore at his face and head, clutching for his eyes, trying for a hold upon his ears. Time and again she repulsed him, then with one wild clutch she caught him by the hair and held him with a strong grip of her right hand while she pummeled his face with a small but energetic left.

Hernandez retreated to the door, unlocked it and gave yent to a low whistle. His whistle was immediately answered. Ponto entered the room, dragging with him the huge brute. "Seize hes," he demanded of the

The girl stared at this huge figure with terror in her eyes.

The brute started across the floor and then whimpering, with hands hanging at his sides, turned away from her. Hernandez nodded to his assistant, Ponto. Ponto drew his everready whip and lashed the brute into obedience. The hoge man, still whimpering, caught the girl in his arms

Hernandez, without the slightest compunction, tore open Annette's

"You vixen," said Hernandez be tween his teeth, "I will get that map Meantime, one by one, on the lower

"The hardkerchief is tied there,

"No." roared the ensign." They reached the third floor corridor and darted into an open room and thrust heads out of an unbarred win-dow. The sallor plucked Neal by the

"There," he whispered. "It's next door to this. The two windows, the bars and the handkerchief tied on. Come on."

They darted out once more into the corridor. There was no door, no opening; but this mattered not to Neal He stepped to the far end of the hall and seized a fire ax, which hung there in a rack. Then he darted back and with ringing strokes began his assault upon the wall. Suddenly from within he heard a woman's shrick.

"Neal," cried Annette's voice within, and it was the voice of a girl beside herself with agony and fear. "Neal, it is I-Annette. Come, for God's sake,

With a crash the secret door went down, and with a bound Neal was in the room. Annette, her dress torn, her hair disheveled, struggled with the brute in one corner of the room. Ponto had released her. With a bound he crossed the room and jerked aside the fireplace, disclosing a secret exit. He crawled through the aperture and

Hernandez, stupefied with astonish ment, yet had an expression of trithrusting a yellow parchment into his pocket. Annette with a final struggle slipped from the brute's grasp and darted toward Hernandez, calling to

"Neal, Neal," she cried, "he's got p. m my father's map."

With one spring Neal was upon Hernandez. He snatched back the hand with which Hernandez was pushing the map into his pocket. The map came out torn and crumpled. An nette, beside herself, snatched at it with both hands. Neal grabbed at it ing at 11 A. M. and 7:30 P. M. and also got a hold. their escape. When the chase was over Neal returned and half apologized to Inez.

"Sorry, Miss Courtier," he said, "but they've made away with your fast motorboat. We couldn't get to ours in time. We landed half a mile or so just up the share. How do you feel?" "Better," exclaimed Inez. "It's the excitement, the noise, the pistol shots

-they have made me well again." Neal thrust his hand into his pocket and pulled forth a crumpled piece of parchment.

"What did you get, Annette?" he in-Annette thrust her hand into her dress and pulled forth her own tattered portion. Inez, watching, bent her head to listen. Neal and Annette spread their two pieces of the map out upon the little stand. Between them they had the bulk of the lower portion of the map. It was a blank surface, save for three things-a little tail of the island sticking down and the words "longitude" and "latitude," and nothing else. Annette laughed in glee.

'We've got everything we want," she said to Neal. "What is here is important. What the man with the saber cut upon his face has got is of no use to him or us. We beat him to it, Neal, we beat him to it."
