"Up-Up," He Cried, Tugging at Her.

"Lock the woman in a cabin," commanded Neal, "and keep guard upon her day and night.

All night he lay, chained heavily, solitary, in the lazarette, working out his own salvation-not eternal, but material. And he always came to one conclusion-"I'll beat them yet."

All night the pilot puzzled his head over his compass.

As dawn broke, in the crow's nest aloft, the lookout shaded his eyes with his hand-then with the same hand shaded his mouth.

"Land ho!" he cried, "land ho!" Neal heard him and hurried to the pilot's side. "Can't be Lost Isle," he exclaimed. "Must be" said the pilot, "we're headed straight for her-straight as the crow files, sir. But I can't under stand it, either-blest if 1-" The sentence was unfinished. With a terrific shock the vessel crashed into an unseen reef-an unknown reef, for they had ventured into uncharted seas Neal understood the danger. The shock was too terrific to be ignored. It meant a wreck-it would be a matter of minutes only before she filled. "Man the boats," he cried, "order

"This," said Annette, "must be Lost Isle-and the admiral was right-it is deserted. Unless we find a Robinson Crusoe here-possibly-my father." Neal shook his head. "I'm not sure it's Lost lale," he commented, "and I'm not sure it's deserted. See that turn in the short line-let's round the corner and have a better look."

Around the corner, some three-quarters of a mile away, a group of naked natives clustered greedily about a fire. Above the fire something-horribly gruesome-turned and turned upon a slowly-revolving spit. Scattered about upon the ground, were human ekulls.

One of the natives held up his arms, uttering guttural sounds and pointed issue of December 16th, 1913 off the shore. The whole crowd broke first publication of this sum into a run-reached the shore and walted. Two men staggered from the water toward the beach. The group of natives set up a yell of triumph . . . here, then, were two more human skulls-two more gruesome forms to be turned upon a spit over a hot fire. Yes. Mariners were quite right. These were indeed, uncharted seas-Hernandez and the Brute were pioneers. The Brute looked straight ahead. He placed his arm about his master's quivering shoulders and stepped up | Benjamin F. Lambert, out of the sea, straight into that diabolical group of twentleth-century anthropophagi. The Brute knew no fear. The black brutes reached forth clutching hands and touched himseized Hernandez. The Brute stretched forth a hand, seized a savage by the neck, and whirled him round and round about his head, striking the black men right and left. Then he tossed his captive into the sea, leaving him to struggle out as best he might.

all on deck. Make haste." He rushed in person to Annette's door and threw it open. In person he lifted Annette and her mother into the first boat. Inez also was included. It was lowered safely. Neal turned to his crew. "Get the lazarette prisoner." he commanded, "drag him into this boat here. Be about it now."

Hernandez, in a frenzy of fear, had been beating with his chains upon the barred door of the lazarette. They dragged him forth, his face working with fear and rage, and bundled him into the second boat-the Brute leaping in behind. Half way down the side something happened-the gear broke. The boat dropped-its one end still held to the tackle-and plunged its human burden into the sea beneath.

Hernandez, heavy with his frons, clung to the Brute. The Brute was still a paragon of strength. With both Hernandez' hands upon his brawny shoulders-with the dragging weight of Hernandez' irons upon him, he swam, with even, steady strokes, toward the shore-swam for an hour. tirelessly, like some huge dog.

Suddenly his feet touched sand. Neal and Annette stood upon a strip of beach, staring all about them.
