LOST—TIME AND OTHER THINGS

The opening sentence of the penultimate note which Lansing sent to Carranza on June 29 revealed the constant factor of dilatoriness which has characterized the entire conduct of foreign relations by the Wilson administration. "I have read," says Mr. Lansing, "your communication which was delivered to me on May 22."

It took the state department four weeks and a day to make reply to a note which Mr. Lansing described in his answer as marked by a "discourteous tone and temper" such as to cause "surprise and regret."

It should have caused, instead, indignation and resentment; and it should have provoked an instant and vigorous retort. What was the occasion for delay? Surely, there was nothing in the situation in Mexico which would lead to even a hope of better manners from Carranza. Surely, there was nothing in the situation which could provoke even a remote notion that better order could be secured. Surely, there was nothing in the situation which could warrant the belief that the United States could further postpone the duty which its long-submerged self-respect imposed.

Yet Wilson and Lansing waited four weeks and a day—and then sent a note couched in language such as the files of the state department have long since familiarized us with, and added to these words a precipitate call for the mobilization of the National Guard. Four weeks were lost. Indeed, more than three years have been lost. If Wilson and Bryan had acted in 1913, just after Wilson came into office, in the same manner that Wilson and Lansing have now acted in 1916, just after Wilson has been renominated, the whole Mexican question would have been settled. We would have saved the lives of hundreds of American citizens, we would have spared the American flag innumerable insults, we would have preserved the purity of scores of American women, we would have maintained our prestige among the nations of the world—for the unhappy results of our dealings with the belligerent powers of Europe are in direct consequence of our manner of dealing with the revolutionary bandits in Mexico. Time has been lost, it is true. But other things quite as irrecoverable and even more precious have been lost also.

France sent us $66,000,000 worth of her products during the ten months ended April, 1915. During the first four or five months of the war, from August to November, 1914, trade was completely upset, ocean tonnage was short, and enormous drafts were made on the belligerents to place themselves in a state of preparedness. During the ten months ended April, 1916, France performed prodigies of valor on the field of battle, and increased her exports to the United States 27 per cent, or to $84,000,000.

For the same periods our exports to France increased from $277,000,000 for 1915 to $478,000,000 for 1916. The things we sent France were largely munitions of war. Our normal exports to that country ran about $150,000,000 annually. The things France sent us were not for war purposes. They were the products of the cheap labor of France coming into competition with the products of American labor which receives the highest wage in the world, or goes jobless if foreign competition becomes too strong.

With the close of the war our exports to France will drop below normal. But her exports to us will increase unless the country possesses that which makes the American wage possible—a protective tariff. France must sell more and buy less in order to make up for the losses sustained in this war. But, dearly as we love torques and our laborers to assist in her rehabilitation? If the Underwood tariff law enables France to increase her exports to us 27 per cent while bearing the brunt of the war, what can she not do to our markets when peace prevails and her entire army must return to gainful occupations? And what is true of France is true of nearly all Europe. Commercial preparedness should go hand in hand with military preparedness, and to insure the former we must return to the protective policy.—Godwin's Weekly.

Give any man a shave and a hair cut, and he looks almost as good as new. A woman can turn the same trick with a curling iron and a little face powder.

There's a lull in the storm on the border, but the lull usually precedes the greatest blows.

THE HORSES POINT OF VIEW IN SUMMER.

If a horse could talk he would have many things to say when summer comes.

He would tell his driver that he feels the heat on a very warm day quite as much as if he could read a thermometer.

He would say: "Give me a little water many times a day, when the heat is intense, but not much at a time if I am warm; if you want me to keep well don't water me too soon after I have eaten."

He would say: "When the sun is hot and I am working let me breathe once in a while in the shade of some house or tree; if you have to leave me on the street leave me in the shade if possible. Anything upon my head, between my ears, to keep off the sun is bad for me if the air cannot circulate freely underneath it."

He would talk of slippery streets, and the sensations of falling on cruel city cobblestones—the pressure of the load pushing him to the fall, the bruised knees and wrenched joints, and the feel of the driver's lash.

He would tell of the luxury of a fly net when at work and of a fly blanket when standing still in fly season, and of the boon to him of screens in the stable to keep out the insects that bite and sting.

He would plead for as cool and comfortable a stable as possible in which to rest at night after a day's work under the hot sun.

He would suggest that living thro a warm night in a narrow stall neither properly cleaned nor bedded is suffering for him and poor economy for the owner.

He would say that turning the hose on him is altogether too risky a thing to do unless you are looking for a sick horse. Spraying the legs and feet when he is not too warm on a hot day he would find agreeable.

He would say: "Please sponge out my eyes and nose and dock when I come in tired and dusty at night, and also sponge me with clean, cool water under the collar and saddle of the harness."

BUYING UTILITY SECURITIES.

If the people can be assured of honest supervision by public service commissions, eliminating politics and graft, they will invest in public utility securities.

At San Diego an issue of $144,000 consolidated gas and electric company stock at seven per cent has been subscribed by customers of the corporation and not all could be supplied.

This is complimentary to popular local management and also to Byllesby & Co., the Chicago and Boston company that handles public utilities on a large scale with scientific system.

There is no reason why public utility stocks should not, under fair treatment from regulatory bodies, become generally desirable for taking up the savings of the people in this manner.

"The character of a town has its influence upon the character of the boys who grow up in it; but no town was ever so tough that a boy could not grow up straight and clean if he wanted to, and no town was ever so good that a boy couldn't go to the devil in it; if he was bound to head that way."

Life is just what each person makes it, but some are too lazy to do the making.
