QUALIFYING
By KATHLEEN M. MOORE.

Genville was only a small town. The male population was in the minority, but the town boasted of a six-star service flag.
A few of the girls had organized a benefit club.
"We'll call it the S. S. S. club," suggested Vera Quinn, "and no one but a soldier or sailor's sweetheart will be eligible."
"Fine!" exclaimed Gladys. "Then Babs won't be eligible, because she hasn't any sweetheart."
The aforementioned Babs heard of the plans and applied for membership on the ground that she had two brothers and four cousins in the service—all volunteers.
"But you must have a sweetheart in order to qualify," informed Vera. "We are sorry, but you can't join."
"Oh, very well, miss," she replied tightly. "I'll qualify before another month is up or my name isn't Barbara Helena Willows."
"And to think Babs will find a Sammy sweetheart in Genville before a month," laughed Ruth, another of the members.
"Girls," called Vera, "we'll put it this way: If Barbara Willows gets a sweetheart in the service inside of one month we'll have to admit her to our club; if not, she can't have another chance."
Arriving at this agreement, the club adjourned.
Two days passed, and soon they grew into weeks. Babs was seen in the park frequently with Ted Barlowe, the dude of the town.
The club met for its regular weekly meeting, and since Babs had another week in which to qualify, the whole evening was spent in discussing her progress.
Tuesday night came and the girls had assembled early and were awaiting Barbara anxiously.
"Has anyone seen Barbara since our last meeting?" asked the president.
There came a chorus of noes.
The discussion drifted to a new family that had moved to Genville a few days ago. Fifteen minutes had elapsed, but no Barbara—then there came a long peal from the doorbell.
"There she is now," they all cried, as Ruth hastened to open the door.
Babs entered looking very charming, and, smiling prettily, she said: "Well, girls, I have won without trying, and now may I be a member of your select club?"
"First give us evidence of your qualifications," demanded Vera, growing uneasy.
"Yes, produce evidence," cried the others.
"Very well," replied Babs, in a matter-of-fact tone of voice. "My work this month has not been in vain," she began, "I not only made myself eligible to the club, but I helped increase the ranks of Uncle Sam by three. Evidence!" and here she opened the door and admitted two khaki-clad and one sailor-clad boy.
The girls gasped in surprise, as they beheld Art Gordon and Bill Stratum in khaki and Ted Barlowe in a natty blue sailor suit.
"Here's is my evidence," Babs continued, taking note of the surprised looks on the girls' faces.
When Vera had regained her composure she said somewhat nervously: "But which is your sweetheart? They can't all be."
"But we'd like to," piped the boys cheerily.
"None of them," and Babs laughed michiavolously.
"None of them!" echoed the girls.
"Then I fail to see where you have qualified," Vera said hastily.
"But, Miss President," don't jump at conclusions," Barbara responded. "I haven't finished yet. Here is my sweetheart, and here is proof that he is my sweetheart," and she held up her left hand, displaying a dazzling solitaire.
At the same time a stalwart young man, dressed in khaki, made his appearance, smiling.
"Allow me to introduce Sergt. Albert Phillips, a new resident of the town of Genville," said Babs. "Sergeant Phillips and I have been good friends for a long time. I met him through my brother when he was at camp," in answer to their questioning glances. "Being home on furlough because of injuries sustained in action, he paid me a surprise visit. Ted, Bill and Art having listened to my preaching for a month or more, enlisted for Uncle Sam and elected me as their godmother. Now have I qualified?" The girls cast envious glances toward Babs and her young army. After a brief silence Vera said: "We certainly take off our hats to you, Barbara. You have overqualified. We admit you for a full-fledged member." Barbara smiled upon her army, which stood erect behind her and said:
"Well, boys, I here come out victorious, just like you boys are going to do some day," and turning to her club sisters she said: "We'll leave Genville tomorrow. The boys for their different stations and I for a farm where I am engaged to work all summer." The girls expressed their regret at this news, but congratulated Barbara on her patriotic spirit.
"I move we enroll Babs as an honorary member of the S. S. S. club," spoke up Ruth.
The motion was carried unanimously, and patriotic Barbara and her four friends received a hearty send-off by the club, and the town of Genville proudly added four more stars to its service flag.
