UNIFORM BOILING POINTS IS GASOLINE ESSENTIAL

It was the needs of the War which caused the Government to seek a standard test for aviation and general motor gasoline as part of its fuel conservation program. The demand for gasoline and other petroleum products had become so great that some action was necessary. Consequently, last summer President Wilson appointed a committee under the direction of the Fuel Administration to adopt standard specifications for gasoline.

This committee stated in its report that there would be no gravity limitations in the specifications for either aviation or motor gasoline because it had been found that gravity was of little or no value in determining the quality of gasoline. The standards adopted were based on boiling points.

Gasoline is known to the refiner as one member of the petroleum family. He distinguishes each member of the family, not by gravity, but by boiling points. Gravity is a fleeting standard of test, but boiling points are unchanging in their value and always determine the quality of the product. Knowing them the refiner can keep his product uniform and reliable.

A boiling point is the temperature at which a liquid will begin to boil or vaporize.

In distilling a given quantity of gasoline the refiner ascertains at what point each 10 per cent will boil, until the entire quantity is evaporated or distilled. In this way he determines what is known as the initial boiling point, as well as all intervening boiling points in the chain, up to the maximum, high boiling point.

The ideal gasoline has a continuous and uniform chain of boiling points, and should have enough low points to vaporize freely and to give easy starting. There should also be the right proportion of medium and high boiling points for quick acceleration, full power and long mileage.

As combustion starts with lower boiling points and flashes through the gas, the continuous, uniform chain is necessary for instantaneous full-powered combustion. Only one line can have this full and unbroken chain.

The United States Government's Standard Specifications, based on boiling points, are generally considered in the light of conditions today, as the most practical standard for gasoline. They insure an efficient and satisfactory fuel, produced with due regard for conservation, and sold at a reasonable price.

All Red Crown gasoline now being supplied on the Pacific Coast is refined to conform to these specifications. It has a full, uniform chain of boiling points necessary for easy starting, quick, smooth acceleration, dependable power and long mileage.

FRED J. KIESEL DIES AT HIS OGDEN HOME

for I have more money than I need." Beside his property here Mr. Kiesel owned a big ranch near Parma, was interested in banks and wholesale houses in Ogden and a heavy stockholder in a Sacramento, California, bank. He is survived by a wife and two children, a son and daughter.

H. C. Boyer of Boyer Bros., formerly a competitor of Mr. Kiesel's company here; Frank Rader of Rader Bros., who bought out the O. F. Co. in 1903 and E. A. Fraser who started his career with the Kiesel organization plan to close their stores today for a short time, as a mark of respect to Mr. Kiesel's memory.
