CON. CLUB NEWS

A circular was mailed from the Secretary's office this week to each member of the club requesting that they set an example to other citizens in cleaning up the alleys and back yards of their business or residential properties. A wonderful improvement could be made if each citizen would take a personal pride in his own premises without waiting "for George to do it."

FAIR BOARD NEWS

From the number of inquiries received from all over the state it is assured that the Tenth Annual Malheur County Fair will be "The Best Yet," but a better response will have to be secured to appeals sent out for a list of rooms and beds that can be placed at the disposal of the reception committee to take care of the visiting guests. The Fair Board has been working hard in providing increased seating capacity at the grounds and feels confident there will be an attendance of at least 25,000 which will mean that some accommodation must be found for outsiders. Do not leave this matter until the last minute, but get in touch with the Secretary's office immediately, notifying him of the number you can house.

Art for Many.

"I do not want art for a few," said William Morris, "any more than education for a few, or freedom for a few"—and civic art is essentially public art. It has been likened to "a fire built upon the market place, where every one may light his torch; while private art is a fire built upon a hearthstone which will blaze and die out with the rise and fall of fortunes. "Beauty in art is truth bathed in the impression, the emotion that is received from nature. Seek truth and exactitude, but with the envelope of sentiment which you felt at first, if you have been sincere in your emotion you will be able to pass it on to others."—Industrial Arts Magazine.

THE CUPID CLOCK

By AGNES G. BROGAN.

Nan went out of the way in order to pass again the shop where the clock was displayed. The clock had fascinated her from the moment that she had first seen it in the jeweler's window—a cleverly fashioned bit of mechanism, the face of the Cupid whose arm encircled it worthy the study of an artist.

Nan had many fancies about the little clock. She liked to picture it in the center of her plain mantelpiece, where the alarm clock now stood.

The clock was expensive, Nan thought, when she stepped into the small store to price it. An interested young man noted the wistful note in her voice as she questioned him as to the possibility of the clock being promptly sold.

"You see," she added, "I want to buy it myself a little later."

The young man understood the significance of "a little later."

"We issue charge accounts," he suggested.

Nan blushed. "I'd rather wait," she answered frankly, "until I have the cash price."

The man gazing unwaveringly into Nan's clear eyes was pretty certain that the clock would be in stock for some time. "They go to the bigger places as a rule for that sort of thing," he told Nan.

She pointed out that no bigger place could possibly offer a clock with that particular Cupid's expression.

"He seems to be laughing right at one," she said.

The young man had noted the challenging smile.

"The little fellow seems cocksure of himself," he said, and he also smiled—at Nan.

When she was gone he removed the clock from the show window and placed it in a deep drawer.

Nan, entering the store breathlessly next evening, wanted to know if it had been sold.

The young man eagerly reassured her.

"If customers don't see it," he explained, "another clock will do as well. I am keeping it for you."

Nan was grateful, her eyes told him so. And the proprietor of the small shop stood, after she had departed, watching her trim figure out of sight down the street.

"Saw a little clock in your window," a collector of curios began, when the young man briskly interrupted.

"Sold," he said.

It was radiant Nan who came glowing in out of a dismal shower to place her complete savings on the shop counter.

"I want my clock," she triumphantly demanded.

The proprietor was as pleased over the sale as herself.

"You had better bring it in during the next few days," he admonished her, "to let me see how it is running. We like to keep them regulated at first."

Nan obediently brought the clock in. It was keeping good time with Cupid still silently jubilant.

The young man himself was not so jubilant. It would be an unreasonable thing to ask his fair customer to return again with so well-behaved a clock, also a suggestion to see her again would be under the circumstances unwarrantable.

The wistful note which had been in Nan's voice as she asked the price of the clock was in the young man's as he bade her goodbye.

"Fool," he told himself. "Why didn't you offer to carry the thing home to her?"

Nan laughed at the Cupid on her no longer undorned mantel.

"You dear!" she said, "you make me believe every time I look at you that something delightful is going to happen. You're hypnotizing me, so that I start out singing in my heart every day."

But if Nan started out singing she returned at evening wearily and with an unaccountable disappointment where the song had been.

She had not passed the shop once, though she had often wished to do so. Common sense asked her why she should go out of her way and to what purpose? And Nan could only bow to common sense and take the short and prudent way homeward.

On a certain evening of depression Nan saw as she glanced at the clock that its hands were still at the hour when she had left in the morning—the hour also to which the roguish Cupid pointed—and the hands refused to be moved.

Her depression vanished inexplicably as she wrapped the clock, pausing to look appraisingly in the mirror. The jewelry shop was still open when she reached it, the young proprietor gazed up at her entrance wide-eyed. He seemed to have difficulty in speaking.

"I—I was not expecting to see you," he explained.

Silently Nan handed over the clock. Then all at once, in fear of losing her again perhaps, or in desperate confidence, he leaned toward Nan.

"We will fix the clock later," he said. "The little fellow's idea appears to be to emphasize the hour of eight. Won't you waive ceremony, please, and let me walk home with you now—at that hour?"

To Nan's astonishment she replied that she would. That was the beginning. Their wedding ceremony later was also set for the hour of eight.
