Give Alfalfa Field a Winter Overcoat.

ing season. It is essential that a sufficient growth be allowed to remain on the field to catch and hold snow, and to afford protection to the plants from severe winter conditions. It is even more important that the late growth be not cut or grazed, since close cutting or grazing makes it impossible for the plant to store up the necessary reserve food material in its crown and roots. Unless there is such reserve upon which to draw, the vigor of the plant is greatly impaired and it is not able to withstand severe winter weather. This is true of old as well as of young plants, and in many cases close cutting has been as responsible for the mortality of the plants as lack of inherent hardiness on the part of the strain.

Late Hay Crop Loses

A common practice of many alfalfa raisers is to cut off a crop of hay rather late in the fall or else to pasture the forage so heavily at this time that adequate growth will not be available for the protection of the crop during the cold weather. The scant hay crop which the grower gains by this practice of late clipping in no respect repays him for the damage which he actually does to his stand of alfalfa. Every farmer should allow his alfalfa fields to grow at random, unmolested during the fall, as by this he is providing the essential warm winter clothes for the crop. Not only should he refrain from cutting any hay but he also should be careful not to graze the alfalfa too closely. This applies particularly to new stands, seeded the preceding summer, as the fall growing season is the time when these new fields establish their root systems and produce sufficient growth for their cold-weather protection. This growth, which ultimately dies and lies like a blanket over the field through the winter, will not reduce the quality of the next cutting of hay, but, on the contrary, will act as a beneficial mulch.

Protecting Animals from Bloat

It is also essential to protect the farm live stock against bloat where they are pastured even lightly during the fall season on the alfalfa fields. This is best done by never turning the live stock on the alfalfa fields at a time when the animals are so hungry that they will gorge themselves with this succulent green feed. Care must be exercised, particularly, not to graze the alfalfa when it is wet, either from recent rains or from dew, as the green crop in this condition is a prolific cause of bloat.

Another reason why late fall cuttings of new alfalfa fields are undesirable comes from the fact that not only are the hay yields limited in quantity, but they also are inferior in quality, being watery and without the bone-building and growth-producing substances which are the valuable elements in well-matured, full-grown alfalfa.
