WOMEN STUDENTS BECOME TEACHERS

Two Alesia women who took training in the O. A. C. Extension service training school last July had within one month helped other women make two dresses, alter seven patterns, do buttonhole and tailor finish work, and design simple cotton dresses.

TRASH PILES BREED PEST

Hordes of insect, rodent and disease pests have gathered under the piles of trash found on some farms, to get protection from the heavy, general rains in Oregon this fall. Unless destroyed the trash heaps will become breeding grounds for still vaster swarms of pests that will forage on valuable crops later. Clean up, burn or bury or haul away crop remnants, boards, and other kinds of trash, say the O. A. C. authorities.

If it's printing, we can do it.

A CORRECTION

In giving the winners in the girl's cooking contest at the Fair in the last issue of The Argus the name of Miss Hardias Rasmussen was omitted as a winner of first prize for the best butter cake. There were two classes of cakes entered and Miss Evidine Cochran and Miss Rasmussen each had a first prize cake.

FIRING STOPS WEED SPREAD

"Burn that wasteland weed patch and stop the spread of weed in neighboring fields," says John R. Nevis, of O. A. C. farm crops. "Firing will not only burn the seed in the plans but will also destroy seeds, insects and other pests on the ground. If the patch is not thick enough and dry enough to burn standing, it can be mowed, allowed to dry, and then fired."
