15 minutes in a gently running washer, with pure soft water and a mild, neutral soap, is the modern laundry way of washing woolens.

To avoid "felting" spinning is avoided in the washing of woolens. Instead, water is drawn out by placing the goods in a fabric-saving spinning basket.

A More Saving and Scientific Way of Washing the 'Family Woolens

Washdays have been in vogue since Adam donned his first shirt, but even yet you often hear it said—"Oh, anyone can do the washing."

And anyone could do the washing the old way, when laundering consisted chiefly of tying the family bundle in the nearest brook and leaving the cleansing to the rippling waters. And most anyone can still do "things" the rub-and-scrub way.

But we know today, that fabrics, like people, have their peculiarities. We know that to meet these needs of your clothes specialized laundering methods must be employed.

Take the "peculiarities" of woolens as an instance. Woolens—our blankets, flannels, underwear, and sweaters—are composed of the same substances as our fingernails and hair. Unless washed in the right way, in the right water, with the right soap, they soften, shrink, and "felt."

Here is the method we use in the washing of your woolens—it is this method which The Laundryowners National Association prescribes:

"Prepare bath by running into washer ten inches of water in inside cylinder. Adjust temperature to 100 degrees Fahrenheit. Add neutral soap and run washer until suds are formed. Place woolens in washer and run 15 minutes. Remove woolens to spinning basket (to withdraw water) and spin for one minute after full speed is obtained. Discharge suds from washer, and run in fresh water of same temperature as used for suds (use thermometer); replace woolens in this bath, and rinse three minutes. Place woolens in spinning basket, and run for two minutes after speed is obtained. Dry at ordinary room temperature. (Woolens should not be dried at high temperature.)"

Your laundress can hardly be expected to know these numerous important details—it has required long study by specialists, and long experience by ourselves to work them out. It is this practice, based on knowledge, which distinguishes our professional service from the domestic.

We use other similarly exact methods for the laundering of colored goods; for cottons and linens; for silks; for everything you send in your family bundle.

Why cling then to the old way with all its work and worries? The assistance of our trained helpers can be yours for the asking. Try this improved service we offer. Phone us today, and have us call for your family bundle.
