

Three brakes on many cars ~ and one is always set

As much as 20% of the power at the rear or driving wheels of the automobile may be lost through the use of an incorrect oil. Too heavy an oil, or one lacking in certain qualities, acts as a brake on the car.

The ideal oil is the thinnest oil which will keep the bearing parts separated, and at the same time offer in itself the least frictional resistance to the engine power going to the driving wheels.

This oil, providing it has "oiliness," stability and purity, will give perfect lubrication and permit the development of the maximum power, speed and gasoline mileage of the car.

Zerolene fills all these requirements perfectly.

The Ideal Oil

All bearing clearances decrease under the heat of operation.

Analysis of Zerolene shows that the differences in its body at the various engine temperatures, from cold to operating temperature, follow in close relation the decrease in bearing clearances.

For this reason Zerolene oils have at all operating temperatures exactly the required body to splash and flow freely into the fast-moving, small-clearance bearings to provide an adequate film of lubricant.

Because of this and its "oiliness," stability and purity, Zerolene gives perfect lubrication under all conditions of engine operation, and permits the development of the maximum power, speed and gasoline mileage of the car.

NURSE AND PATIENT

By ROSE DAVIDSON

© 1922, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

The more Leon Ashley looked into the lights opposite the more like a grinning face they seemed, until the whole thing got on his nerves. He pressed his hands to his burning forehead. "Why did they move me out here?" he muttered.

One by one the white-garbed nurses rose from the benches where they had been sitting, all taking what they believed to be the last look at the strange man whose identity was still unknown to them, yet whom they had all learned to reverence. They were leaving him alone to stare out at the city lights, the city that belonged to his people and to him.

Once he had held himself erect at the thought of the royal blood he possessed, but now, somehow, after living close to his fellow-men in ditches and dugouts, he felt that he was going to share that pulsing life, that an ordered existence was going to make him what he had been, just a puppet of the people, who must act, year in and year out, as his royal family had done, and the nerves of his face ached with intolerable agony as he thought of the happiness within his reach, the love that might have been part of his life.

From the room opposite there came the faint strains of a song, which stopped altogether as the singer pushed the door open wide and crossed the balcony to where the stranger was sitting. "Come, come, is this the way you celebrate your release?" the little nurse exclaimed.

The man continued to gaze straight out before him—not at her, for he felt that if he looked at her all his fortune would give way.

She drew a chair close to his. "I didn't mean to make light of your departure," she said softly.

And still the soldier sat, moodily and taciturn. He was handsome, as the men of the royal family had always been, with a bearing which caused men and women to follow him with their eyes.

The little nurse leaned closer to him. "There seems nothing to say except 'Good-by,'" she said softly.

Leon Ashley turned quickly. "Helen, I don't want to leave you," he exclaimed.

A flush suffused her face at his words.

"Forgive me," he said. There was a sob in his throat as he spoke.

"For what?" she asked, and as she spoke she put her hand on his brown hair as a mother might have done. Her voice was infinitely sad and tender. "Forgive you for caring?" she asked.

"Oh, but you do not understand. This is the end for us."

She grew suddenly pale.

"I wanted you to love me," he continued. "I wanted it from the first, but I knew that when I left here everything would be over for us. I know I was a contemptible cad to encourage your friendship, but as time passed I learned to care so much that I thought of nothing else."

The little nurse looked into his eyes. "I believe you," she said slowly, "and it makes me happy. Please do not pity me. I have known all along I recognized you the first day when you were brought in so very ill." She stopped suddenly and sat very still.

He reached his arms toward her, but she drew back.

"It's such a wonderful thing to live simply as I have done during this war; he went on finally; "such a wonderful thing to be loved for oneself alone. I can never really live again—it will be like acting a part in a play—rising in my father's kingdom, marrying one whom the family selects, no doubt, and always dreaming of you, Helen, and that life and love I might have had."

"Ah, don't," she cried, putting out her hand as though to ward off a blow. "Don't say it, don't even think it. Sorcery is no new thing to me, though I am young, but I do not question it. I shall never regret having known and loved you." She paused a moment.

"When there is some terrible thing in life to do, it is best to do it quickly Good-by," she said, putting out her hand.

"I could not touch your hand. If I did, I could not let you go," she heard him saying softly.

The little nurse turned and left him walking quickly along the narrow halls. The feeling of death was upon her. She hurried on to her room in the house opposite. She had given him great honesty always, she would give it to him until the end. He knew that she suffered, but she desired him to know as well that she was brave that her spirit was unconquered, that she would do something rather than weakly suffer in ineffectual rebellion. She lighted a small candle, as she had done for many weeks and, holding it in the window, with her head held high, waved her good-by, and across the distance she had covered she knew their eyes met.

Taking Himself Seriously.

"I understand you had a visitor yesterday."

"Yes," said Mr. Cobble. "He was a candidate for something or other."

"Didn't you find out what office he was seeking?"

"Well, he did say, but it kind of slipped my mind after he unloaded the floodgates of his eloquence. I gathered that if he wasn't elected the whole bloomin' country would go to wrack and ruin, but whether he was running for President, the United States senate or constable of beat 12 is more than I can tell you."—Birmingham Age-Herald.
