University of Oregon, Eugene, Ore., May 17.—A fermenting mash that any Vale householder can make in a few minutes at five cents or less expense proved in an experiment conducted this week by the University of Oregon extension division to be the best fly bait. The following five baits were put into competition:

No. 1. Ordinary table syrup, the kind used for waffles and pancakes.
No. 2. Decayed banana.
No. 3. Salmon from a can; the salmon had been exposed to the sun.
No. 4. Crab that had been left in the sun until decay had begun extensively.
No. 5. A mash made of bran, mixed very wet with waste potato water and skimmed milk, sweetened with molasses (brown sugar will do), and containing plenty of active yeast so that it had fermented furiously.

These five preparations were put into five traps and the traps were set out side by side at a Eugene fly headquarters. The results after 20 minutes' exposure of the traps were as follows:

No. 1. Four flies.
No. 2. Ten flies.
No. 3. Twelve flies.
No. 4. Thirty nine flies.
No. 5. Two hundred and twenty flies.

The capture of 285 flies in 20 minutes is at the rate of about one every five seconds.

"I think a properly constructed trap baited with the fermenting mash described will catch every hungry house fly within a city block if the day is warm and sunny and the fly can get to the trap readily," said Dr. Hodge. "Honey mixed with this bait adds to the cost and probably does not make it better. There are baits that will draw flies more readily than even this mash, but they are too offensive to describe and too dangerous to use; the discharges from open sores of animals are one. The character of these affinities show how great a menace to mankind the housefly really is."

The fact that the bran mash drew six flies to every one caught by the decaying crab and 18 to every one caught by the stale salmon does not necessarily rule either of these last named baits out. The place of experiment was near a slaughter house where the flies were glutted with animal food and turned gladly to the pleasant variety afforded by the mash. In a competition in a city block where animal food is scarcer, the catches might be more even, but Dr. Hodge considers the mash the best general bait under almost any circumstances.

"Flies love variety," said Dr. Hodge. "In a brewery, a trap should be baited with milk; in a dairy, with beer." The house fly, or typhoid fly, is most strongly attracted by rich, li-
