A Bathroom for the Farm

In no way is electricity serving the farm family better than in making possible a modern up-to-date bath room.

When water had to be pumped and carried by hand, when it had to be heated on the kitchen stove, and when tubs had to be gotten out especially, then getting ready for and taking a bath meant a lot of disturbance and muss. But electricity has done away with all this. The small electric light and power plants now in use on so many farms all over the country furnish plenty of power for the operation of electric pumping systems. These systems have been developed to such a great extent in the last few years, that they are now almost entirely automatic. Once installed, the pump, driven by an electric motor and controlled by a pressure switch, keeps water under pressure at faucets all over the house. The water service thus obtained is in result the same as that enjoyed in the city. There are very efficient heaters, too, which will heat plenty of water for a bath in a half hour or less, or which will keep the water hot all the time if desired. All this means that any member of the farm family can now have a hot bath in a real tub at the mere turn of the hot water faucet.

State health departments have for many years urged the adoption on the farm of sanitary measures such as indoor toilets and sewage disposal systems and the same authorities are thoroughly convinced of the value of the health of the farm family of convenient, ready-at-the-minute bathing facilities.

Many farms that have electricity consider the bath room the best service electricity has given them, but there are, of course, many other reasons for the increasing popularity of electricity on the farm. It gives the best of light in all parts of the house and barn, it does all such chores as pumping, milking, separating and sweeping, and in doing these things it lightens the labors of every member of the farm family.
