MORE MILCH COWS, ETC.

On the other hand, would the freight not be less on a few tubs or butter than on a carload of hay of equal value? And the by-products can be kept at home. This plan may require the raising of a few hogs and some poultry, but why not; other industries figure on their by-products' taking care of a large part of the expense.

I hope that no one will get the idea that we are advocating dairying for the sake of dairying alone. Would it not be as bad to depend on milk cows alone as on wheat alone? We are making a plea for more livestock on the farms of the county. We believe that no agriculture is so permanent as that which involves the keeping of a reasonable number of cows, hogs and chickens on every farm.

We would like to quote here from a letter from O. H. Liebers, who had charge of the food control work in Colorado during the war, and who is an influential livestock man:

"We have your letter regarding the dairy cow development work in your territory. Your organization could do no better work than to work on a campaign of the kind you have outlined.

"I have been in Wisconsin five different times this fall buying cows for different communities and I am always impressed with the bank deposits, the ability of the farmers to pay their interest and taxes, and their buying the usual necessities, and also the general business condition up there. They do not feel the hard times that we do. If any one of our communities added one thousand additional good dairy cows, it would make a decided difference in the business condition of the community. We are ultimately coming to more intensive dairying and the communities that are taking the lead will profit by it most."

Mrs. W. Fenn and her daughter, Bernice, who live near Nyssa, spent several days in the county seat this week because of court interests.

The King Construction company purchased a large truck from the Ford garage this week.

Carroll Mansur left Wednesday afternoon for Portland, where he anticipates spending the remainder of the winter.

POLISH GOWN EFFECTS

STYLES HAVE GREAT DIGNITY AND ELEGANCE—TEA GOWNS ATTRACTIVE.

Suffering Poland has furnished the Paris dressmaker with her inspiration for the fashions of this fall and the coming winter, according to a Paris fashion correspondent. From this war-racked, poverty-stricken country has come the lead for the luxury of the world. It is not the Poland of today that is dominating, but the Poland of ancient glory which kept step with France in her progress toward civilization.

Many missions have gone from France into Poland, and each group has returned impressed by her pathos and her beauty. These missions have had a bearing on present-day fashions, all of which are of the Renaissance period, touched with the Polish influence.

The Polish-Renaissance influence is a transforming one because practically every part of the dress has been touched. Sleeves have been made larger and in fancy style, both open and with under sleeves. Collars have heightened and have grown very important looking. The waistline has dropped several inches. The skirt has lengthened and taken on a flare, so this movement is almost revolutionary.

These styles have great dignity and elegance. They call for the use of rich materials of heavy weight. Trimmings are heavy in the form of big cabuchons, nail heads and heavy embroideries that stand out from the background. The goldsmith's trade was at its zenith during this period and the costumes of the nobility were adorned with real and semi-precious jewels and ornamented with hammered gold and silver. Today all of these effects are being imitated with great success.

Quilted Velvet Model. Such fringes as are used are heavy. Being made of acet, chenille and strings of large beads instead of the fine silk strands of modern times.

There is a new line of quilted materials brought out by Rodier, which works up wonderfully in these Polish-Renaissance models.

One of the most striking examples of the Polish styles is the model named Nijlusk, made by Jean Patou.

The Tan Broadcloth Suit Which Features Perforated Trimming; Brown Monkey Fur Is Used.

It is of Rodier's Gloc, a quilted velvet, the quilting being done in gold thread. It is trimmed with black Persian lamb fur and has hammered steel nail head embroidery on the undersleeve and a heavily jeweled grille worn at a low waistline. The model holds the keynote of much that is new and interesting in forthcoming fashion for autumn and winter.

In common with many other of this season's tailored dresses, it shows a high muffled collar. Persian lamb was chosen for it, and the same fur trims the sleeves and forms bands down either side. This old-fashioned fur also is having a renaissance and will be one of the most fashionable furs this winter. Black Persian lamb is extensively used as a trimmings.

Copies of this dress have been made with the high muffled collar of cloth embroidered in hand effect or entirely covered with embroidery. It also has been worked out in cloth fringed with monkey fur.

Style from emphasizing the Polish blouse in tailored suits, Patou shows three-quarters and seven-eighths length tailored suit coats with wide flaring circular cut fullness. Many of these show the low blousing waistline or low belted waistlines of the middle ages and the Renaissance period. From an inspirational standpoint in design the Polish peasant dress and the Italian Renaissance court costumes of about the Sixteenth and Seventeenth centuries have furnished most of Patou's ideas.

The Renaissance is strongly predominant in the sleeve effects of both dresses and mantles. He makes the wide flowing and bell shaped sleeve, often accompanied by an under sleeve of brilliant contrasting color.

New and interesting garments show a combination of cloth and fur. One model from Madeleine de Madeleine is developed in perlabre, Rodier's new material. In a deep-pumpkin shade trimmed with Hudson seal.

A tailored suit is also from Madeleine de Madeleine. For it they have selected perforated broadcloth and have worked it out in the new beltless coat effect.

Practically every important dressmaker in Paris is using perforated broadcloth as a novelty. It is often underlaid with a contrasting color, as in this instance where brown crepe de chine is used, the crepe de chine exactly matching the color of the fur, which is brown monkey skin.

The One-Piece Dress. A simple style of one-piece dress designed to be worn under a fur coat is developed in a gray broadcloth, the skirt being of the cloth and the bodice of a mixed metallic material showing a reflection of red and steel. Hand-some steel buttons fasten the collar and one side of the bodice. A three-quarter length gray squirrel coat was made to accompany this frock. It is one of Madeleine de Madeleine's models.

The same house also shows among their new things a popular cloth street dress made of velours de laine in a beautiful shade of beige trimmed with applique rounds of brown satin and having a high fur collar and fur cuffs.

A beautiful tea gown or negligee, whether it be for formal or informal wear, is dear to the heart of every woman. This type of garment follows the lead of dresses. It is indeed difficult to distinguish those of more formal character from an afternoon or evening gown.

Callot adheres to long and slender lines in negligees. One of her loveliest models—a draped affair of velvet brocaded chiffon in a burnt orange hue—features a back hood drapery. In addition to drapery at the hips. She trims the shoulders as well as the bottom of the skirt with narrow bands of squirrel dyed brown to blend with the orange-colored chiffon.

The same designer has created many models from uncut strips of material by cleverly draping them to the figure from the shoulder to the opposite hip, allowing the ends to form an uneven train.
