Freedom of Speech" Does Not Justify Anarchism.

Equally is heard the assertion "this is a free country." It is retort that springs to the lips of individual, or group of individuals, when he or she is reproached or called to account for action which is objectionable or detrimental to the community. Some there are, doubtless, who actually believe that conditional freedom, the liberty of individual, is equivalent to the right to do anything to which is impulse, without regard for the rights and privileges of others. Some know better, but misuse the idea of freedom to justify acts which cannot be permitted because they rely upon it to appeal to the ignorant and gain for them the support of those in the population when assembled in any considerable number, constitute a mob.

Of course, every intelligent person, and if he is honest he freely admit that he knows, just as this nation is free and dependent only within its legitimate rights, so every individual has personal liberty circumscribed by the rights and privileges of his fellow citizens, and that the same is true of groups of the population.

The guarantee security of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness of the inhabitants of this country, the purpose of the constitution and the statutes based thereon, logically that acts which interfere with the pursuit of happiness of any inhabitant or group of inhabitants of the United States, cannot be permitted to any other person or group.

Man's house is his castle," and the Constitution he is secure from unreasonable searches and seizures. There is law to protect him from violent entry. But he is not in his home or on his premises engaged in activities, or maintaining conditions, that are an annoyance or a detriment to his neighbors.

Citizens are free to walk or drive their automobiles, and go wherever they wish, because that freedom is for the benefit of the community. It is not to be used to do anything that would obstruct or impede the progress of the community.

Freedom of opinion; not for freedom of speech, but only for the freedom of opinion; not for freedom of speech, but only for the freedom of opinion.

Freedom of speech, but only for the freedom of opinion; not for freedom of speech, but only for the freedom of opinion.

Freedom of speech, but only for the freedom of opinion; not for freedom of speech, but only for the freedom of opinion.

citement to violence. The same is true of the freedom of the press. And upon the constitutional right to assembly there are the restrictions that it must be peaceful and non-obstructive. When a crowd assembles, however peaceful it may be, if it obstructs traffic, it is made to disperse unless special permission has been given for the assemblage or for the things that attract it—a parade, for instance.

And citizens are free to work wherever they can find employment that suits them, as long as they meet requirements, or to quit work that they do not like. Because they are, it is not and cannot be, the right or privilege of any person or group of persons, or any authority to compel any to work where they do not want to work, or to prevent them from working where they do want to earn their living and the opportunity is offered.

These examples of the limitations of freedom, of personal liberty, might be multiplied many times, but even these few are presented with an apology to the many to whom they are so familiar, so much matters of course, that they may wonder a little, at the first thought why we have presented them at all. The reason, which is likely to come to mind of all who wondered at first, is that there are always some who believe, out of ignorance, or have been misled to believe, that liberty is the equivalent of license.

Congressman Burton Talks to Europe Straight From Shoulder.

Congressman T. E. Burton, of Cleveland, member of the American Debt Funding Commission, was invited to address a luncheon given by the American Chamber of Commerce of London. He took occasion to refer to the inter-allied debt, although he made it clear that he was speaking as an individual and not as a congressman or member of the debt funding commission. Mr. Burton was emphatic in his statement that the disposition of the people of the United States is to require payment of the inter-allied debts owing to America. He gave three reasons for this popular conclusion: First was the feeling that international credit and especially debts "have a certain degree of sanctity—I might say of sacredness." The second is that the amounts loaned by the United States to the allies were provided by loans obtained from the people who furnished the money, involving personal hardship and sacrifice. The advances were not from an overflowing treasury, but were made possible by the action of the United States in becoming a borrower alike with these debtors and at the same time. The third reason stated by Mr. Burton is that the burden of taxation in America is quite as heavy if not heavier than that in the European countries whose obligations were held by the United States.

Mr. Burton might have added that while all of the allied countries emerged from the war with an award of large indemnities or vast concessions of enemy territory, and in the case of Japan with a big slice of territory taken from a nation that was not a party to the war, Uncle Sam asked nothing and received nothing. He was content with a belated recognition of a few of the badly mutilated 14 points, and even these poor remnants of humanity's confident demands have been more or less repudiated in the game of international grab instituted since the war. But at that the people will be pleased that Congressman Burton has stood up for the rights of his nation, and has not volunteered to turn over to Europe a pledge to cancel the American debt out of hand, with the key to the national treasury to boot. In this regard his luncheon address was in delightful contrast with the breakfast at which Mr. Cox and Col. House had with the British premier, and in which they told him in substance, that if the allied diplomats see anything more that they want from Uncle Sam they have only to ask for it.—Akron (Ohio) —Beacon-Journal.

That every city should grow, if it is to grow it will grow through industrial development.

That when it ceases either to attract new industries, or to build its present industries into bigger, or more efficient industries, it must cease growing, become stationary, or go backward.

That the city with the most unstable industries is always the city that must drink in the fullest measure, the dregs of business depression, the hardships of general unemployment, the heaviest losses through business failures and the greatest demoralization in its entire economic and commercial structure.

That the industrial development of many cities has been held back for many years by lack of such effort to point out their advantages to manufacturers.

That factories are locating every day in cities not nearly as favorably situated as yours.

That every citizen should have a better knowledge of your city, its advantages and its possibilities.

That you should not be a drifter, be a builder. Do you strive to make your city a progressive business city, a friendly city, a city with a vision, a city that will go ahead and each year through the co-operation of every citizen, become a bigger, better, brighter and busier city?

FARM POINTERS.

Silage for stock is a form of succulence and not a balanced ration within itself. In feeding it, roughage such as alfalfa or clover hay should be used or some other good nitrogenous feed supplied. When properly combined with other feeds silage is the means of promoting the health of the animal.

Poultry litter should be watched carefully at this time of the year and changed as often as it becomes damp and heavy. It has a tendency to hold moisture which soon makes the poultry house very damp. A damp poultry house always invites disease.
