Reynolds Lives High

Hugh Reynolds, former employee at the Herald office, reports high times at his ranch on an island in the Willamette a few miles south of Corvallis. According to Reynolds he is living on bear meat, wild turkey, venison, mountain trout and cream. He mixes his metophors some, but as Reynolds was raised near the Mississippi cane brakes, where bear, turkey and venison are as common as fless in Oregon, it is not surprising. "He" went out before breakfast the other morning and caught 'a half dozen mountain trout in a pool behind the barn as long as his leg." Anyone can see that statement is confusing. Catching mountain trout in a pool as long as his leg behind the barn.

is as improbable as catching a half dozen trout as long as his leg in a barnyard pool. They had them for breakfast. He says they drink milk and cream until the butter works out of the corner of their mouths, which is barely possible, but he didn't explain how he got kicked by the bull when he ventured too near that animal with a pail on his arm. Reynolds was raised in a printing office. He has seen a few dogs and some chickens and he has observed horses going along the street but cows are out of his line. The lactic colored fluid he is used to getting was taken cent; dyestuffs, 1900 percent; ferrules, from a can carried around in a cream
