"On His Own."

The English have an expression which may be very old, but which has not become familiar to Americans until recent months. It is "on his own."

A listening patrol is sent out into No Man's Land. Signals have been arranged. One click of something metal on a shrapnel helmet may mean "move to the right." Two clicks may direct the party to something happening in the enemy's trench on the left. Three clicks is understood to read "on your own." That is, each member of the patrol is expected to use his own initiative in hunting for information, hunting for weaknesses in the Prussian defense or, if that seems wisest to him, to squirm his way back to his trench. Whatever he does will have been his personal responsibility. He will have been "on his own."

The boy who has left home is taken up again this week, meeting on "on his own." The traveling Thursday evening instead of Tuesday salesman from the moment he as formerly.
