THE PASSING OF DOBBIN
The tractor on the trail of Dobbin, inexorably pursuing him, and with almost assured certainty of eliminating him from agriculture. One of the pushing promoters of the gas-driven machine for turning over soil in some derision points out that here mankind has made almost no progress in centuries. Only from the ox to the horse have we advanced, and the step is so short that it is scarcely noticeable. But the tractor proposes to lift the farm operation up to the plane attained in other industries by the introduction of machinery.
No service accomplished by the horse is beyond the range of a tractor, with the advantage on the side of the machine at every point. It eats nothing a man can eat, says one prospectus; it works under conditions that are impossible to the horse; a change of drivers is all that is needed to make it a continuous performance in the field, and plowing goes on night and day.
Time for seedling is shortened, more ground can be prepared and in better manner than by the horse-drawn plow, and generally the whole list of processes of crop-raising is done in more expeditious and economical fashion, and the profits of farming are correspondingly increased.
Just as the automobile is driving the horse from the cities, so the tractor is chasing him from the farms. It may be long before he vanishes, for there are millions of him in America, but he is no longer a money-making proposition and therefore is doomed.—Omaha Bee.

With the world's supply of ships about 20 per cent short of normal and the allies' need of food imports increasing, the following facts about shipping will interest American farmers: A ship can make two trips from the United States to Europe and back in the time required for one round trip to the Argentine. And it can make three from the United States to Europe and back in the time required for one round trip to Australia or the Indian ocean. Shortage of ships has reached the point where the long journeys must be given up and the ships used on the trans-Atlantic routes. The great task of rural America this year will be to supply enough food to load these ships and others being built.

The landing of American marines in Vladivostok to participate with Japanese and British forces in the restoration of order will demonstrate to all the world, Russ and non-Russ alike, the international character and the unquestionable purpose of the action, says St. Paul Dispatch. American participation should carry particular weight with doubting Russians since America is credited with having frustrated the original Japanese plan of occupying the port to protect stored war supplies from German seizure.

A man's money is no substitute for what he can do for his country. No man can do more than his part, for his part is all that he can do. Therefore, one's money cannot employ somebody to do for one what one neglects to do.
A London scientist says that man was the ancestor of the ape, and not the ape the ancestor of the man. It doesn't make any difference which was the first parent, neither has anything particularly brilliant to brag about.
