A HOWLING SUCCESS.

The Pisa Guide That Was Unique In Coaxing an Echo.

Mr. Howells in his story of early travels in Italy describes an interesting experience and a "unique" guide, both of which he encountered in Pisa. The baptistry stands but a step from the Campo Santo, and the guide ushered the party in with the air of one who has held his great stroke in reserve until now. He waited until they had looked at some comparatively trifling sculptures before he raised his voice and uttered a melodious species of howl.

While we stood in amazement the conscious structure of the dome caught the sound and prolonged it with a variety and sweetness of which I could not have dreamed. The man poured out in quick succession his musical wails and then ceased, and a choir of heavenly echoes burst forth in response.

There was a supernatural beauty in these harmonies of which I despair of giving any true idea. They were of such tender and exalted rapture that we might well have thought them the voices of young eyed cherubim singing as they passed through paradise. They seemed a celestial compassion that stooped and soothed and rose again in lofty acclaim.

We were long silent and then broke forth with cries of admiration, of which the marvelous echo made eloquence.

"Did you ever hear such music as that?" asked the guide.

"The papal choir does not equal it," we answered with one voice.

The cicerone was not to be silenced even with such a tribute. He went on:

"Perhaps, as Americans, you know Moshu Fillmore, the president? No? Ah, what a fine man! Well, one day he said to me here, 'We have the finest echo in the world in the hall of congress.' I said nothing, but for answer I merely howled a little — thus! Moshu Fillmore was convinced. Said he, 'There is no other echo in the world.'

"I am unique," pursued the cicerone, "for making this echo. But," he added, with a sigh, "it has been my ruin. The English have put me in all the guidebooks, and sometimes I have to howl twenty times a day.

"When our Victor Emmanuel came here I showed him the church, the tower and the Campo Santo. Said the king: 'Pfu!'—here the cicerone gave that sweeping outward motion with both hands by which Italians dismiss a trifling subject. 'Make me the echo!'

"I was forced," concluded the cicerone, with a strong sense of injury in his tone, "to howl half an hour without ceasing."

A Terrible Threat.

An engineering operation uptown made it necessary a few days ago for one of the workmen to hold another on a rope halfway down a deep well. A fall would probably have been fatal, and Patrick kept the rope tight and steady while Terence made the dangerous descent.

After a quarter of an hour Patrick's attention wandered to something else. Instinctively he kept hold of the rope, but he did not hear Terence calling to him that it was time to pull him up until his fellow worker raised his voice in angry protest.

"Pull me up," called Terence. "Pull me up, I tell ye. If ye don't pull me up, drat ye, I'll cut the rope, and then where'll ye be?"—Philadelphia Times.

The City of Paris.

The founders of Paris, emigrating from some Greek or Etruscan country on the shores of the Mediterranean sea, rowed their galleys up the river Seine. They took possession of the island in that stream on which their city is built and, according to the legends that have come down to the present time, called it "Baris," which is Greek for a boat then used upon the river Nile, whence Paris. The island on which the adventurers landed was held to typify a boat, and to this day the coat of arms of that famous city is an ancient galley.—Argonaut.

One Way Out.

An influential woman member of a fashionable church in Philadelphia had gone to her pastor with the complaint that she was greatly disturbed by one of her neighbors. "Why," said she, "that man in the pew behind ours destroys all my devotional feelings when he tries to sing. Couldn't you ask him to change his pew?" The pastor reflected. "Well," said he at last, "I naturally feel a little delicacy on that score, especially as I should have to give a reason. But I tell you what I might do—I might ask him to join the choir."
