

Rock

It all started when she was feeding the animals on the farm and turned her back on one of the rams.

"Next thing I know, I went flying through the air, landed on the rock wall, rolled down off the rock wall, and started crawling away and had a feeling I should look behind me," Caward recalled. "And I look around behind me and the sheep is on top of the wall coming down on top of me head first, and I just thought, 'I am dead, dead, dead, dead.'"

At this point, Caward curled up in a ball on the ground with the expectation that she would be killed by the animal, but then Sheba vaulted off her back and took the ram down and hung onto its nose until Caward could escape.

As a young woman working on a farm every day, she quickly forgot the back injury and went on with her life.

It wasn't until a decade later that her doctor discovered she had actually broken her back, and gave her a choice between back surgery and eventually winding up in a wheelchair, she said. Caward chose surgery, which kept her back injury at bay for a good 19 years, she said.

She said she loves the people who come to visit the rock garden. She loves talking to people, but she envisions living on a piece of land with some friends where she could perhaps raise animals, sleep in, and enjoy her later years.

"Enjoy yourself, it's later than you think," Caward said, invoking the inscription on the Statue of Liberty rock structure her grandfather made.

Kaisha Brannon, the real estate agent helping Caward sell the property, has a personal connection with the rock garden and wants to see it go to the right buyers.

Brannon said her grandparents and parents visited the rock garden, and growing up, it was a special place she would go see as a kid. Now, her own children are exploring the garden while she shows the place to prospective buyers.

"I was super excited when I got the phone call, because I do know the Petersen Rock Garden really well, and I do know how important it is to the community and to Central Oregon, so ultimately this is very dear to my heart," she said. "It's not necessarily about the real estate transaction for me. It's very much about helping Susan and finding the right person that is going to be the new person that takes care of the property?"

While there is no way to know what the future owners will do with the property once they buy it, Brannon said she is doing her best to vet buyers to ensure the rock garden winds up in the right hands. Brannon added that the rock garden is open to the public during the selling process, and Caward hopes people will still come visit at this time.

Kelly Cannon-Miller, the executive director of the Deschutes County Historical Society, said the historical society stands ready to provide research and background to whoever ends up buying the beloved rock garden.

"I hope the person who buys it is ready to take it on and loves it the way people have loved it over the years," Cannon-Miller said. "It definitely has a community memory attached to it. Folks who grew up going there want to go back and see it and remember family visits."

Cannon-Miller explained that back in its heyday, the Petersen Rock Garden accommodated thousands of tourists in a given year driving up and down U.S. Highway 97, which back then was mainly referred to as The Dalles-California Highway.

At the time, during the 1940s and '50s, visitors could visit the rock garden's museum, which still stands today, and could take a swan boat ride on the pond or grab a bite in the diner in addition to exploring the rock garden. Having lunch and contemplating life outside on the lawn surrounded by peacocks and Petersen's art was a popular pastime for visitors, Cannon-Miller said.

"Between 1935 and 1952, Rasmus (Petersen) was always still building and changing it, so it had that changing attraction element to it as well," Cannon-Miller said of the rock garden.

Petersen's art was influenced by both his childhood growing up in Denmark, combined with his experience homesteading and farming in Oregon, a combination complimented by his irreverent sense of humor and his contemplation of nature, Cannon-Miller added.

Petersen died of a heart attack inside the museum on the property in 1952 at the age of

Although homelessness may be less visible in Redmond than in larger cities such as Bend, it is an issue that has grown quickly — along with the city population and housing costs.

"This is not about a building," Wysling said. "This is not about a renovation. This is about hope."

The inn will act as a temporary place where residents can find immediate stability and be pointed toward permanent housing. Shepherd's House and Oasis Village are two more transitional shelters planned for Redmond, each one trying to fill a wide gap in current services.

"It's a Band-Aid," said James Cook, a community advocate. "Everyone in a shelter is still considered homeless."

Without permanent affordable housing, Cook said that the issue will continue to grow and homelessness will become a bigger problem in Redmond.

Bethlehem Inn program director Tara Feurtado seems an immediate need that the inn can help fill. Feurtado said five individuals had already reached out for help on Thursday's opening night.

"Our individuals are a part of the Redmond community," she said. "The face of homelessness is all of us."

Brandon Stutzman, a photographer and documentary filmmaker from Redmond, is one such face. As a child, he lived at the former hotel that has now been turned into the Bethlehem Inn. This time, however, he was there helping deliver $14,500 to the inn — after he ran 100 miles and did 1,000 pull-ups in 33 hours on the Dry Canyon Trail in April.

Stutzman is planning an even more audacious goal to help raise more money and awareness for the Bethlehem Inn — aiming to raise $30,000 while running 200 miles and doing 2,000 pull-ups and 2,000 push-ups along the Deschutes River Trail in August.

For those interested in sheltering at the Redmond Bethlehem Inn, Feurtado said to call organization's shelter in Bend and ask for help in Redmond. The organization will work same-day intake and each person will be handled on a case by case basis.

After 3-5 days at the inn, individuals will talk with a case manager about their specific situation and what would be most useful to help them secure a more permanent residence. Intake days are Tuesday, Thursday and Friday.
