"Their first priority is life saving," Mooney said.

Crews scope out the structure and try to determine whether the fire started outside and is moving in or vice-versa, then pull hose lines to where they can reach the blaze.

The event, which saw dozens of firefighters participate, was the grand finale of training for four new recruits who will soon work shifts for the department.

By the end of December, Redmond Fire & Rescue will add nine new firefighters to their team as they try to keep up with Redmond's dramatic population growth. To meet the national standard, they will still have to hire 30 more firefighters over the next five to six years.

Additionally, Mooney emphasized being mindful of fire around the holidays — one of the most common times for structure fires. He said to follow instructions when deep-frying turkeys for Thanksgiving and to water Christmas trees every day.

street parking.

Additional changes include updating workforce and affordable housing definitions and requiring deed restrictions, changing requirements for attached garages and ADUs, modifying landscaping standards and creating a neighborhood meeting requirement for large-scale development proposals.

Additionally, the planning commission amended the comprehensive plan to include Redmond's proposed wastewater facility.

"The planning commission recommends that city council moves forward with the amendments as stated," said Ron Osmundson, vice-chair of the planning commission.

Osmundson said homebuilders and construction companies were very supportive of the updated amendments. Despite the unanimous approval and support from builders, however, there was some confusion and apprehension surrounding the requirements for when a traffic impact analysis is triggered.

"Traffic and mobility is the city's largest infrastructure problem," noted Roberts during the meeting. "It's also the most complicated piece of our land use reviews."

Multiple participants, including Hayden Homes, expressed concern that extra requirements for a traffic impact analysis would delay city approval times amid a housing shortage in Central Oregon.

"We encourage city staff and commissioners to consult with transportation professionals regarding these modifications..." wrote Megan Norris, forward planning manager for Hayden Homes, in a letter. "An additional unknown timeline for review would put an additional burden on review times and hinder delivery of much needed housing in Redmond."

But, Osmundson emphasized that the transportation impact analysis changes would only change the process builders would be required to go through rather than an actual amendment change.
