Bucks for Books campaign fills shelves

Dec. 7, 1922 — From 'local happenings'
Two degrees above zero this morning, with a blanket of snow eight inches deep, is the condition of the things in Redmond. Maurice Gates, who has been suffering from a severe case of pneumonia since the football game with Oregon City, is reported slightly improved.

Dec. 11, 1947 — Future Farmers proud owners of Caterpillar
Proud possessors of a D-6 Caterpillar tractor and bulldozer is the Redmond union high school chapter of Future Farmers of America.

The big machine arrived last week, and was obtained by the chapter through the state department of education from the war assets administration.

To finance the purchase price, amounting to about $600 delivered, the boys have formed a share organization, with most of the members buying an interest.

Many of the boys have fields of their own, adviser Stanley Green explained, and they will rent the machine from the shore group to do leveling, ditching and other jobs. The equipment is expected to pay for itself several times over in this way.

From Dec. 10, 1997: Durinda Sanders paints a cheery greeting on the window of Redmond International Hair Port at Wagner's mall. A transplant from Oklahoma, the stylist said she tackled the painting because she was "a little bored."

The tractor, which is of medium size, was worth about $7,000 when new, Green said. It has only been used about 2,000 hours, and should be run another 5,000 hours before needing repairs or an overhaul.

Dec. 13, 1972 — Redmond receives more revenue sharing money than estimated Redmond apparently is one of the lucky few municipalities which are receiving more, rather than less, revenue sharing funds than originally were estimated.

City administrator Ed English reported that Redmond received a check Monday morning for $36,990 from the U.S. Treasury Department. Local officials have been informed that the checks being received this month represent payment for the first six months, or one-half the annual amount due to the cities and counties. If so, Redmond's annual payment would be $73,980, or nearly $9,000 over the $65,000 estimated last summer.

English said misrepresentation of the complicated formula used to compute payments probably was to blame for the difference between the estimated and actual figures.

English said Redmond's revenue sharing funds would be deposited in the bank until such time as City Council directs what the monies should be used for.

"The funds would be better spent on capital improvements rather than day-to-day expenditures," said English, pointing out that if the monies were used for operational expenses, Redmond could be "hard-pressed" to show what had been accomplished with the federal funds. He noted the accounting procedures on the funds still have not been totally clarified.

Redmond donations have passed the $5,000 mark, making the area the second highest in per-capita donations. So far, the community of Sisters is leading the campaign.

The Redmond library has held hay rides and a craft and bake sale, and it plans a pie social and silent auction from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Friday at the library to raise more money for buying books.

Elementary school students have pitched in their pennies to help boost the total. The libraries are striving for 3,000 donations, not a specific amount of cash. Through last week, about 1,000 people had contributed to the effort.

Bucks for Books is scheduled to run through Jan. 15, and this week's direct-mail solicitations represent a "critical point in the campaign," said Michael Gaston, director of the Deschutes County Library.

More than 190 volunteers from around the county spent many hours stuffing the envelopes, saving the library system about $2,000. In addition, the printing was donated by CAN-AM Management, ONLINE Publishing Service.

The Bucks for Books campaign is intended to replace a substantial portion of the library's book budget, which was cut by $175,000 this year.

Donations may be earmarked for a particular community.

Dec. 10, 1997 — Campaign yields new titles for library

If the books "The Man Who Listens to Horses," "Celestine Vision" and "The Silent Cry" are ones you've been dying to read get ready: They're on their way to Redmond.

The first literature purchased through Deschutes County's Bucks for Books campaign will hit library shelves this week.

And if library supporters cross the county heed the solicitations arriving in the mail this week, those books are just the beginning of what's to come.

The Bucks for Books fundraising effort began in October and has raised more than $22,000 to buy new books and magazine subscriptions for library branches throughout the county.
