Wool Manufactories in Oregon.

The following editorial from the Portland Journal is of especial interest to the people of this section, while the question of whether or not Stayton is to have a woolen mill is being investigated. The Journal says:

The St. Johns Review, our nearest newspaper neighbor outside of Portland, presents some interesting facts about the new woolen mills there, which should be encouraging to capitalists who have the enlargement of the woolen manufacturing industry of Oregon in view—if there be any such men, and we hope there are.

The St. Johns mills are running night and day, and cannot supply the demand for their products, one order for 65,000 yards of flannel being refused last week. The monthly yield is now about 40,000 yards of woollens, being over 25 per cent above the yield of the Sellwood mill before it was burned. About $75,000 a year is paid to employes, many of whom own their own homes or are purchasing them with their wages. The stock of the company, $175,000 common and $175,000 preferred stock, is nearly all owned by Portland men, who in investing their money in this way not only made a good investment for themselves, but greatly benefitted St. Johns, Portland, and the whole state.

Other woolen mills, if well managed, are prospering, and many others might do so. The mills at Oregon City, Salem, Pendleton, Brownsville and other points, including the one to be rebuilt at Albany in place of the one recently burned, are praiseworthy pioneers in an industry that should expand to many times its present proportions in Oregon.

Twenty million pounds of wool are produced in Oregon annually, the greater portion of it in eastern Oregon where sheep must be sheared without washing, so that about two-thirds of the fleeces in weight are dirt and grease, which without scouring mills must be shipped to eastern cities, mostly to Boston, and freight paid thereon, and then some of the products are sent back 3,000 miles to be sold in our stores.

Oregon mills ought to scour and manufacture most of the home-grown wool, so that not only Oregon people would be supplied with Oregon made blankets, flannels, and woolen clothing, but have a large quantity for export. And in this connection Oregon people ought to stick to and practice the motto, "Patronize home industry." Help those beneficial and admirable manufactories by buying and using their goods, which are the equal of any similar goods produced anywhere on earth.

Last week we published a statement of the condition of the Stayton State Bank after the first six months of its existence. Since the paper was published we have heard various complimentary remarks regarding the showing made. The statement shows an excellent condition of affairs, the business done amounting to more than could reasonably be expected in so short a time for an institution of the kind. The fact that the Messrs. Freres are known to be careful and conservative business men has no doubt had much to do with this excellent patronage from the start, and these gentlemen have every reason to be proud of their institution. The Stayton State Bank is on a sound financial basis, and will be kept in that condition under its present management.
